ANECDOTES.

ANTIEN SCOTS CUSTOMS.

A VERY dreadful circumstance occurred in 1665, which affords a striking picture of the peculiar manners of the Clans at that period. Alester Mackull*, one of the vassals of the Laird of Murlle, having received some offence or injury from the above chief, conspired with others, and murdered the Laird and his brother. The Privy Council commanded the offenders to surrender themselves to take their trial, without effect; upon which an order was issued to a clan residing in their neighbourhood, requiring them to bring in the heads of Mackull and his associates. This they accomplished, but with the loss of near eighty persons killed and wounded; when the heads were exposed on the gallows between Leith and Edinburgh.

Four young men were whipped through the streets of the latter city by the common hangman about the same time, and afterwards transported to Barbadoes, for interrupting and abusing Mr. James Scot, Minister of Ancram, when preaching.

GRAND VIZIER.

The London Gazette of March 29th, 1666, describes a very singular scene which took place the 13th of the preceding February at Constantinople, in these words :

“ Last Friday in the afternoon, the French Ambassador, with more pomp than usual, went to his audience to the Grand Vizier. At his entry he made several stops, expecting the Vizier would have risen to him ; but, finding no more respect, he sat down on a stool provided for him, and by his dragoman demanded more honour in the name of his master, whom he styled all along (Emperor of France). But the Vizier, incensed with the manner of demanding it, brake out into a passion; which the French Ambassador resenting, rose from his seat, and in going away, threw the capitulations, with the case, over his shoulder, which it seems hit the Vizier on the breast; upon which the Vizier called to his officers to apprehend and strike him, which was presently executed by the Capigis larke haite, or Master of the Ceremonies and Pages, who hurried him out of the chamber, where he received several boxes on the ear, and blows on the breast breast from Mahomet Bassa Capigi, Bassa of the Vizier, who carried him prisoner into the Chiaus Bassa's chamber in the Vizier's house, into a bad low room under the stairs, where he was kept from Friday till Tuesday, whence he was delivered by the intercession of the English Ambassador; who, with much difficulty, obtained his liberty, they having taken severe resolutions against him.

“What reparation will be made him we know not, the discourse being of having him clapped up in the seventh Tower, or sent home prisoner to his Master. Monsieur de Guitry, a person of quality, sent on purpose by the French King to be present at the solemnities of his reception, was fairly a witness to his Excellency's most exemplary buffeting.”

THE CARDINALS DE RETZ AND BARBERINI

AND COMEDIANS.

These distinguished persons caused the commission of a deed in 1666, which, to use a modern French phrase a little altered, covers their memories with disgrace. Many reviews of the troops of France had taken place, and those were supposed to be satirised in a farce frequently acted, termed The Knights of the Review. This piece had been forbidden, but in vain; the prelates, therefore, determined on revenge, and commanded their servants to chastise the Comedians,

“ which was done with that violence and earnest,” says my authority, “ that turned the farce into a tragedy, seven or eight persons being killed in the quarrel.”

SIR WILLIAM BERKLEY AND CAPTAIN REEVES.

Both these naval officers suffered in the dreadful victory obtained by the British fleet over that of Holland in July 1666. The former was killed, and the latter severely wounded. The Batavian nation seems to have acted with strange inconsistency in the cases of these brave men. The body of Sir William was conveyed with great respect to the Hague, where the States General ordered that it should be embalmed, and placed in the chapel of the principal church; and they at length wrote to our Monarch, informing him of their proceedings through the medium of a flag of truce, declaring their high sense of his courage, and their desire to receive the commands of his Majesty as to the further disposal of the remains of Sir William.

The generous sense of honour thus demonstrated cannot well be reconciled with the baseness of character more forcibly exhibited towards the unfortunate Reeves. This gentleman was captain of the Essex, and captured under a series of unlucky accidents; his ship had received many shot below the water line, and putting her about in order to stop them, the vessel fell on board of the Bull then precisely in the same situation.

Before this event occurred, the captain was struck by a musket-ball, which passed towards his throat from the upper part of his cheek, and caused so great an effusion of blood internally, as to render him speechless; and all his officers were either killed or wounded. True to the trust reposed in him, Captain Reeves beckoned to the gunner, and intimated his wish to blow the ship up; and, while the Dutch were in the act of taking possession of the Essex, these undaunted men proceeded hand in hand to the Magazine, but happily the enemy had previously secured it.

He was then taken upon deck, where the boarders stripped him to the skin, and afterwards conveyed him on board one of the Dutch men of war, the commander of which denied him the assistance of a surgeon, or any other covering than that of a rug. The next day he was put into a boat to be sent to Flushing, but he contrived to throw himself into the sea, whence the crew dragged him with their boat-hooks.

On his arrival at the above city, they secured his limbs with irons, and actually left him three days without any kind of sustenance; when, finding that he must perish if not relieved, they removed him to the house of a Provost, where, by the assistance of surgeons sent to examine his wound, he recovered sufficiently to write to Government,

Government, which gave his narrative, to the world in the Gazette.

THE LADY OF LORETTO, AND THE AMBASSADORS OF FRANCE AND SPAIN.

The combination of mistaken piety and pride, which forms the substance of this anecdote, is well worthy of reflection; but, although we can readily imagine that the representatives of two rival monarchs would seize every temporal opportunity of maintaining their national honour, it is less easy to comprehend how the Ambassadors of a most Christian and a most Catholic king could so far forget themselves and their religion as to insult the Pope at his own threshold, and deprive the Virgin of her expected offerings.

It had been customary for the natives of the Province della Marca, resident at Rome, to form a solemn procession to Loretto. This devout act was suspended for some reason during the pontificate of Alexander, and revived in that of his successor, after an interval of twelve years, in September 1667, under the direction of Cardinal Pallotta, who ordered the construction of a large machine, to be drawn and supported by eighty porters and six oxen concealed from view, with numerous musicians attending habited as angels.

The preparations excited great interest and curiosity; the streets and balconies were crowded with spectators on the day appointed for the ceremony, ceremony, and the fronts of the houses were adorned with the best pictures and the richest hangings. Every thing being in readiness, the Cardinal received an intimation that the French Ambassador's suite had been invited without his knowledge, and were actually waiting to take the post of honour as their Sovereign's right. Alarmed lest any dispute should occur on this subject between those persons and the Spanish Envoy's domestics, the good Cardinal entreated the masters of each to order their people home. This rational and very proper request was decidedly refused by the Frenchman, whose conduct became so turbulent, that the affair was communicated to the Pope, who wisely forbade the procession.

The following extract from the London Gazette of May 8th, 1671, forms a very proper sequel to the above narrative. "Madrid, On Sunday last, the Sacrament passing by the French Ambassador's door in procession, his Excellency, as the practice is of persons of quality on such occasions, sent six of his pages with lighted torches in their hands to attend the Host; who going about to precede the pages of the Duke D'Albuquerque, who were there upon the same score, a warm dispute arose between them.

"The French pages, finding themselves too weak, and unable to make good their ground, retired home, but immediately returned again better provided with arms, and stronger in number than than before, and, coming up with the others, fired their pistols and carabines. The Spaniards that followed the procession, being much incensed thereat, drew their swords, killed two of the French, and dangerously wounded several others. Both parties being thus exasperated, they proceeded so far as to threaten to pull down the Ambassador's house, from which they were hardly withheld by the officers and soldiers, who, in the beginning of the tumult, were sent to protect his Excellency's family from the violence of the multitude. At length, upon the approach of the Queen's guards, and some persons of authority, all things were appeased again. The Ambassador hath been since to make complaint to the Queen hereof, who, having expressed herself much troubled at what had happened, assured him she would take care all imaginable satisfaction should be given him in the matter."

THE GULPH OF VENICE AND THE RIVER PO.

The above river flows into the gulph, and, previous to the year 1666, had deposited vast quantities of sand, decayed vegetables, and mud, which at length appearing above the level of the sea, produced an exhalation so very deleterious, that the Senate determined to alter the channel of the river so as to carry the soil where its effects would be less pernicious to Venice. This resolution seems to have been equally rash and impolitic impolitic with respect to the probable consequences attending a failure of the necessary barriers to the stream, and the resentment of the injured parties in case any accident occurred.

Two thousand men were employed on this arduous undertaking, in the progress of which the accumulated water forced away every human restraint, and, rushing through part of the territory of Ferrara, levelled nearly sixty houses, drowned one hundred and forty persons, and rendered the surface of the land where it passed a mere desert. The Cardinal Legate of Ferrara, Corsini, represented the unhappy event to the Pope, who was so highly incensed, that he immediately summoned the Venetian Ambassador and Cardinal Ottoboni, informing them of his determination to withdraw his troops and galleys then employed in the service of the Republic, and to take immediate measures to restore the Po to its original channel. Thus terminated this Quixotic exploit.

NEAPOLITAN BANDITTI.

We often hear of very atrocious and dreadful acts committed by public robbers in all parts of Europe; but they are generally cowardly, and the party concerned seldom fails to escape through the precautions of disguise and the hours of darkness in which he makes his attack. Two Neapolitan banditti, who perished in 1669, were exceptions exceptions to the justice of these observations. They had, on some occasion, irritated each other to the extreme of animosity, and separated; but, happening to meet accidentally in the Carmelites' church at Naples, where devotion or plunder invited them, one observing the other attentive to the officiating priest then celebrating mass, drew his dagger, and gave his enemy two mortal wounds. The dying villain had sufficient strength to seize a musquetoon he had taken into the church with him, and, levelling with precision, the assassin fell dead on the pavement before the Altar.

THE DE WITTS.

There are few who are not acquainted with the tragical fate of the two brothers of that name. The fact has been related in a variety of ways, each expressive of the detestation universally entertained against the ferocious and almost cannibal conduct of the Dutch mob; but those are not decidedly warm from the impression made by the horrid deed, and consequently are deficient in interest when compared with "The true relation of what happened at the Hague on Saturday the 20th of August 1672, as it was written in a letter from thence, and printed in Holland," and afterwards in the British Court Gazette.

It

It will be sufficient for the present occasion merely to observe that the helpless De Witts were under prosecution by the tribunal of the country or Court of Holland, which ought to have had the exclusive cognizance of their political offences; and the publick should have waited for its sentence, and thus prevented an indelible stain upon the character of the Nation.

“ I tremble when I take my pen into my hand, to acquaint you with the sad spectacle we have seen here in the Hague on Saturday the 20th instant, in the persons of the Ruwaert van Putten, and the late Pensionary de Witt, the former having that morning received his sentence, by which he was declared incapable of holding any employments in the State, and banished for ever; it thereupon followed, that the Barber, who had accused him, being set at liberty, every where as he passed the streets, told the people that the said Ruwaert was guilty, and deserved a severer sentence than that which was given against him; and it happening that the said Pensionary de Witt, going in his coach to the Port, where the said Ruwaert was prisoner, to fetch away his brother, they were both, as they were coming away, stopped by the watch, who would have discharged their muskets upon them had they not presently retired into the Port again. In the mean time the people, being very much dissatisfied with the aforesaid sentence, and it being reported reported that the Bores were coming with no good intention to the Hague, the drums were beat for the bringing the Burghers in arms, which was presently done; they, being in all six companies, posted themselves on the Vyverberg Fuyten Hoft, and before the said Port, where they continued till almost five in the afternoon, about which time they broke open the prison doors, notwithstanding three troops of horse were drawn out to prevent any disorder, whom the Burghers kept off with their pikes, and afterwards forced to retire, and fetch down the said Ruwaert and his brother the late Pensionary; the former being in his night-gown, having been pulled out of bed, and the other in a black velvet coat; who were soon thrown under foot by the people, after having received several wounds, as well by musket shots as otherwise; but this not sufficing, the dead bodies were trampled upon and dragged up and down the streets. First their two fingers, which they had held up at the swearing to the perpetual edict, were cut off, and then their ears, which were taken up by some boys, and presented as a great present to the first person of quality they met; after which they hung the dead bodies by the heels on a gallows, their cloaths being torn all off, and the flesh mangled in a most miserable manner, every one striving to get a piece, which they afterwards sold up and down the town, one joint of a finger for twelve stivers, stivers, a whole one for fifteen stivers, a piece of an ear for twenty-five stivers, and a toe for ten stivers, and so proportionable. In this manner the bodies remained hanging on the gallows, now made naked, and in this manner mangled and exposed to the scorn and mockery of the people till about midnight, when several persons in disguise came and privately removed the same; so that certainly a sadder spectacle hath hardly been ever seen. It is said a certain woman coming from Sceveling, being informed of what had passed, fell upon her knees, and heartily thanked God for it; so strangely were the people enraged against these two brothers, who thus miserably ended their lives."

MR. BRUCE'S LIVING VIANDS.

More than one hundred years past, some abandoned persons published a weekly paper in small quarto, under the title of "Poor Robin's Intelligence," which may be truly said to contain every combination of words that are capable of producing indecent and infamous ideas; in short, it is unfit, with few exceptions, for the perusal of those who are impressed with the slightest sentiments of virtue. A circumstance mentioned by Mr. Bruce to have occurred during his journey to discover the source of the Nile induces me to quote a passage from "Poor Robin," dated "Moregate, March 29, 1675. Near this place there there is a monster-shop, where every thing that is ugly, or strange, proves a very vendible commodity. They sell you animals by retail, and you may have two penny-worth of a living Cow, as readily as a cut of roast-beef."

Mr. Bruce says, he met a party of Abyssinian soldiers who drove a Cow before them, and in his presence cut several slices of flesh from her, after which they covered the wound with the skin; and, proceeding, made the miserable animal accompany them to serve for their future repasts. The repugnance universally felt by his readers to the cruelty of this method of obtaining fresh beef led them with one voice to deny the possibility of the assertion; indeed, it contributed in a great measure to bring his work into general discredit. It has been justly argued in his favour that we are guilty of equal cruelty in plunging living lobsters into water and boiling them to death, and in keeping eels writhing in sand and skinning them alive. The above quotation is still more to the point; and however fabulous the article, it certainly serves to prove that even Englishmen had conceived such an idea, which had probably been realized by Barbarians long before the authors of "Poor Robin" existed.

Specimen of Wit in the reign of Charles II.

“ NEW BEDLAM.

“ Here is built so magnificent a structure for the entertainment of Lunaticks that it would make a man almost mad to live there ; but, if all the distracted people about this city were to be admitted, it had need to have been built as big as the Escurial or the Turks’ Seraglio. What think you of those that have spent considerable estates in pursuit of the Philosopher’s stone, which (like that of Sisyphus) upon the pinch of the business returns upon the undertaker, leaving to begin de novo? or of such as will stake their patrimonies upon the chance of a die, and part with their fortunes by wholesale, as the other did by retail? What are they that will go a serenading, that is, breaking windows, engaging with constables, and catching of Tartars, choosing rather to be woundy drunk and sleep in the round-house than in a warm bed and a whole skin? Or those that are horn-mad, and, not contented with a private disgrace, must publish it to the world? Is not the tradesman mad that will trust other people so long that nobody will trust him? The creditor mad, that, rather than abate the interest, will lose the principal, and make dice of his debtor’s bones? Certainly these and a thousand more would be putting in for a lodging here, had the charitable founders designed it it only for such as are deprived of their senses, which (it is to be supposed) those I made mention of never had *."

It would be extremely imprudent for a person of respectable connexions to select one of the most decent members of a society of Debauchees for an intimate, and to retail his quaint conceits or wit, and still more so to introduce him to his friends ; but I think it perfectly innocent, if not commendable, to rescue certain worthy articles from bad company, which are to be found in the work mentioned in the note: such is the description of the BEGGARS OF 1676.

" Lincoln's-Inn fields. Here is a general rendezvous of common beggars, who resort to this place as constantly as merchants to the Exchange, or gallants to the Playhouse : these are your standing beggars, by whom you know the time of the day as infallibly as by the two club-men at St. Dunstan's church. They have as many ways of winning people to compassion, as lovers find out to gain their mistresses' favour ; some do it by importunity, others by whining and sniveling, others by hectoring, others by entreaty, and others by silence ; which with many passes for the most powerful sort of oratory, as if the sincerity of a man consisted in saying nothing : they have more disguises than a Jesuit, and the lustiest rogue of them all (which in canting they call upright-man) will counterfeit sickness, blindness, lameness, nay, and (like Ulysses) madness itself, rather than serve his country, or take up arms upon an honest account. By such arts as these they pick-lock men's benevolence, and as it were rob the credulous and merciful, who, by a charitable mistake, supply their riot, instead of their necessity; for their clubs and villanies are propagated by the farthings and halfpence of some well-disposed Christians, as the late rebellion was by the zealous contribution of bodkins and thimbles.

“Many of them have the trick of making themselves cripples (at least in appearance) on purpose that they may move men to charity; as I have known a fellow in the country set his cottage on fire, with a design to get a contribution from the parish, or as a mountebank fool pretends to scald his hands with the fat of bacon, in hopes that the ignorant crowd will prove the better customers.”

THE PILLORY.

“These are to give notice that Peter Pinch, baker, dwelling in Light-loaf-lane, intends at the next Sessions to sell his share in a pair of spectacles, which are made of substantial two-inch board, not to be worn upon the nose, but the neck and wrists, through which a man may clearly see his faults, and his enemies, and be made feelingly sensible of the swift flight of goslings, ducklings, and chickens, while they remain in the cloister of the egg-shell; they are fit for all ages, from 18 to 60, and teach such as use them the most difficult distinction between good and evil."

GALLANT ACTION FOUGHT IN NOV. 1678.

British bravery is well known to be of antient origin; it is an heir-loom of the great English family, constantly capable of enlargement, and never was more likely to descend to our remote posterity with increased value than at the present moment. The same invincible spirit which gained the great victory of Trafalgar reigned in the breasts of the officers and crew who are the subjects of our admiration in perusing the following letter from the London Gazette of December 5, 1678.

"From on board the ship Concord, commanded by Captain Thomas Grantham on the 24th past in the night, being in the latitude of 48, about 120 leagues from the Land's-end of England, we met with three sail of ships, and a small barque, one of which proved to be the Admiral of Argiers, a new frigate of 48 guns, called the Rose, and commanded by Canary a Spanish renegado; the other two Virginia-men, the one of Plymouth, the other of Dartmouth, and the barque of Ireland. The Algerine hailed us in English, from whence? We answered from London; he told us he was the Rupert frigate, and commanded our boat on board, which our captain refused, knowing it could not be the Rupert. The Turk kept company with us all night, which gave us some time to fit our ship, and get our boats out; when it was light, he put abroad his bloody flag at the main top-mast head, fires a gun, and commands us to strike to the king of Argiers, and to Admiral Canary: we gave him a "What cheer, hoe!" he comes up with us, and passes his broadside upon us, having 13 guns on a side of his lower tier: we returned him as good a salute as we could; he steered from us, falls a-stern, loaded his guns with double head and round partridge, and then came up again with us, claps us on board, grapples with us on the quarter, and made fast his sprit-sail top-mast to our main bowlines, our main-sail being furled. After two or three hours' dispute, finding he could not master us, he cut away our boats, and fires us on the quarter, and our mizen-yard being shot down, fired our sail, which burnt very vehemently, and immediately set all the after-part of our ship on fire. Our Captain kept the roundhouse and cuddy, till the fire forced him to retreat, all that were with him being killed and wounded; and being got down into the great cabin and steerage, he sallied out with those that were there, with a resolution rather to be burnt than taken. In the interim the Turk's fore-sail, hanging in the brails over our poop, took fire; then he would fain have got clear of us; but we endeavoured to keep him fast, and as many as run up to cut him clear, we fetched down with our small shot, until his sails, masts, shrouds, and yards were all in a blaze; then we cut loose, and immediately his mast to the deck went by the board, with many men in his top and his bloody flag; several of the men betook themselves to their boats, but at last they overcame the fire, as, thanks be to God, we did likewise on board our ship, having our mizen-mast burnt by the board, and all the after-part of our ship burnt; there was little or no wind. The Turk got out his oars, and rowed till he was out of shot of us; had it pleased God we had had a gale, we should have released many Christians; we had not leisure to save any Turks, but preserved one Nicholas Humfries, formerly a mate of a ship, who had been in slavery 13 months; from whom we understood, that the day before, this Canary had in company with him three Algerines more, one of 34 guns, the other of 30, and the third of 28; that that their design was to cruize between the Land's-end and Ushant, and that they parted in chasing certain ships; that there are 24 sail of them abroad, most of them out of the Streights. There being but little wind, the Algerine and we kept in sight of each other all day and the next morning, and then it proving a small gale, and having an account from the said Humfries of the three other Algerines, we steered away our course for Virginia; but that day, viz. the 26th, about two in the afternoon, we saw a sail a-head of us, standing with us; we fitted our ship, and when he came near us, he proved one of the three ships abovementioned, viz. that of 34 guns; we stood with him; upon which he fills and runs from us, we chased him till sunset, then stood away our course, and saw no more of him. We had killed and wounded on board of us in the action with Canary 21 men; but of the Turks, according to the account from aboard them, at least 70 or 80 are killed."

Those who are not admitted to a participation in the secrets of the various Governments of Europe, have ever been unable to account for the apathy with which the depredations of the natives of Barbary on the commerce of almost every nation are received by Kings, Princes, and Republics, who prefer purchasing temporary forbearance to a manly determination of rescuing their

their subjects from certain slavery, if captured when in pursuit of their respective voyages by those relentless Pirates. Many powers have at different periods sent ships to bombard their towns; but, in the intervals between those attacks, others have sent presents of armed vessels and money, the effects of political jealousy rather than of a desire to conciliate the Barbarians. It is much to be lamented that the sufferings of individuals held in the very worst species of captivity, should still be considered of no importance in the exercise of this detestable policy. The London Gazette of September 25, 1679, contains a curious list of the Naval force then possessed by the government of Tripoli.

WONDERFUL INFANT.

The publick were amused by many absurd stories towards the close of the reign of Charles II. founded on the supposed supernatural powers of an infant but three years of age, who was said to speak several languages fluently. The ignorant exclaimed inspiration ! The father, more politic, denied the assertion ; and contrived to have the child conveyed to the King at Windsor, in order to convince the monarch it had indeed a most extraordinary faculty of acquiring and retaining correctly those sentences it had been taught.

ASIATIC MAGNIFICENCE.

The splendour of the Eastern Monarchs has been the theme of historians from the period when Moses composed his inspired writings to the present moment ; it has unquestionably surpassed that of all other nations, but is rapidly declining, through certain causes which may be divined without much difficulty. Making due allowance for exaggeration, an old and common fault with many travellers, our thanks are due to Benjamin Harris, Editor of "The Domestic Intelligence," for "A letter from an English Merchant at Decan, a city near Surat in the East Indies, belonging to the Great Mogul, dated November 20, 1678."

"I arrived here the 31st past, and found this city of Decan grown poor and almost lifeless for want of trade. Shaftch Chaan, who is uncle to the Emperor, and has been for some time governor of this province, being called back from hence to the court, is departed from this city a few days since with his retinue of Paschars, Mahall and other servants, being a vast multitude of near two hundred thousand people; having left Decan almost as it were gasping: the immense wealth he carried away with him being hardly credible, having near 400 land carriages, and as many great boats to convey it. He went away with all the splendour and gallantry imaginable, attended with 12,000 horse and 800 elephants.

It would be too tedious to insist upon particulars, and would appear like a romance, only that it is thought this Governor is like to be a great favourite at the Emperor's court; and if so, it will be well for the English. He is resolved to dazzle the eyes of all persons with his magnificence. Preparations are making for his public entrance into Delhi; and the Emperor is to be presented (according to the custom of that country when governors are called home) in the manner following; upon the first day with an hundred elephants, and their cloth furniture, and on each of them a bag of 5000 rupees; on the second day an hundred elephants more, with their furniture of gold; on the third an hundred more, with their furniture of silver; and for twenty days days after, five elephants a day, till the whole number of 400 elephants be completed.

This Shaftch Chaan bought every year a thousand maund of copper, on purpose to make copper chests to hold his gold; his expences were 20,000*l.* sterling every day (Query, good Merchant, every month ?); and in beetle only 100*l.* daily; his yearly revenue of Bengal only is three-score millions of pounds sterling; the yearly revenue of Hugly is 90,000*l.* sterling. Shaftch Chaan kept for fourteen years last past 1000 camels to be ready to carry his treasure when the king should send for him.

He never went a hunting with less than 100,000 men; he kept two thousand women and eight hundred elephants."

POLICY IN RELIGION.

Violent and ardent were the struggles of the Roman Catholics for ascendancy about 1680; plots, counter-plots, fire, poison, assassination, and the gallows, were common terms with the Protestants when charging them on this head. The words "hellish," and "damnable," were in constant use upon every trivial occasion; and the Papists had the general character of the "most accomplished persons upon earth in the kindling and promoting of fires."

It is well known that the majority of the inhabitants of England were inflexibly determined to

to resist the revival of the antient faith of their forefathers; they more than suspected their Royal family intended to restore it: they therefore exerted the rights of a majority over a minority, and justly punished those whose zeal prompted them to transgress the laws enacted to suppress the Roman-catholic religion. Policy led the Protestants to bend the vulgar mind to their purposes, by hand-bills and pamphlets, and paragraphs in the newspapers suited to their capacities, in which every diabolical act conceived by man was dressed in the coarsest language, and attached to the priesthood of the obnoxious party; a specimen or two may not be unacceptable as an illustration, the titles are sufficient. "The whore of Babylon's p—y priest; or, a true narrative of the apprehension of William Geldon alias Bacon, a secular priest of the church of Rome, now prisoner in Newgate; who had just before been above two months in cure for the —; wherein is inserted a true copy of the Apothecaries bill found in his chamber, containing the whole process of that Reverend father's — cure, with several other remarkable relations and proofs of the debaucheries and villanies of the Popish clergy in general." 1679-80, Another "True Narrative" was pronounced "very necessary to be known by all persons, to serve as an ANTIDOTE, to keep them from being prejudiced diced by the POISON of their most HELLISH and damnable TENETS."

In order to counteract these exertions, the Jesuits are said to have deputed three of their members from Rome, who entered Leghorn, bearing heavy chains on their naked limbs, and crowned with thorns, whipping themselves till sanguinary streams reached the earth. Their voices, in unison with their actions, were raised in plaintive notes, proclaiming that the sufferings of the faithful in England were far greater than those they experienced. Such were the expedients of Policy on the Continent; but we matched them with pageants of burning the Pope and his colleagues, and have fairly triumphed.

THE ESCURIAL.

The effects of lightning have ever been particularly dreadful on high buildings, and yet it is singular that steeples and towers are not more frequently injured by it; many instances might be adduced to prove that cottages and the earth have felt the force of this subtle fluid, when objects infinitely more elevated have escaped without injury. Philosophers speculate almost in vain upon the phenomena exhibited by the electric fire in its passage through the atmosphere, and such substances as it meets in its way; and it would baffle the most experienced in his endeavours to explain why so many flashes of lightning have

have occurred over London, perhaps some thousands, when not more than twenty of its towers have felt their effects in the revolving of several centuries. Iron is acknowledged to be one of the best conductors, and as every steeple is surmounted by a pointed spindle for the vane, we might suppose part of the contents of electric clouds would be attracted to them, and the destruction of the structures follow from the want of a continuation of the same metal to the earth. The celebrated Franklin, aware of the numerous partial attractors to be found on towers, churches, and other buildings, suggested the use of Iron rods linked and pointed, to ascend their sides and the highest parts of the edifice; the efficacy of which cannot be for a moment doubted, as the upper ends of the rods are frequently ascertained to be melted into drops, without the inhabitants of the houses to which they are generally affixed in America, being sensible of the least shock during the passage of the fluid. Had those excellent safeguards been discovered 128 years past, the cupola of the Escorial might possibly have escaped very serious damage. In the month of June 1679, a flash of lightning descended on the brass ball of 750 pounds weight, which was supported by a pyramid of stone, and beat both to the ground.

THE PRINCE OF CONDE AND PARISIAN LABOURERS.

The extreme servility of the French to their Royal family and feudal Lords in times past, can only be equalled by the recent insolence of the lower class, when a transfer of power occurred more astonishing and unexpected than has hitherto been recorded by the historian. The coaches of the great in London are frequently driven in a most rapid manner; indeed the Hey! of the coachman is but too often the instantaneous precursor of his horses feet; and Gare! has long been the signal of death in Paris. The regulations of the former city were always infinitely superior, where the carriage of the Prince must keep in the line prescribed by the laws of the road; and if any obstruction should occur to prevent his progress, the attendants must wait a reasonable time for its removal; it is to be hoped that this is the case in the latter at present, and that nothing similar to the following event may ever happen again. In the month of July 1679, the coach of the Prince of Condé was impeded in its passage through the street of St. Denis by several soldiers and labourers, who were employed in dragging a vast block of marble intended for some public purpose. The servants of the Prince, without doubt partaking of the impatience of their master, and fully impressed with the importance portance of a few minutes' delay, in his removal from Chantilly to his town residence, ordered the men to perform an impossibility, which they resented, probably in rather disrespectful terms; the magnanimous attendants, exasperated at this unexpected opposition, drew their swords, and, attacking the workmen, severely wounded several, but were prevented from further outrage by the commands of the Prince. On the following day the Marschal de la Feuillade sent humble offers of reparation to his Highness, promising to have the labourers punished, for provoking the chastisement they had received!! The London Gazette, whence this fact was extracted, is silent as to the subsequent conduct of Condé.

MIRACLES.

The Miser is not more delighted with contemplating his gold than are the superstitious with reading or hearing a wonderful tale. The public mind is certainly much enlightened since the close of the 16th century; but there are yet numerous individuals willing to be deceived, who are frequently gratified by the kindness of their friends, and, though often laughed at for their credulity, still believe and repent. To such I beg leave to address several most marvellous stories, fabricated for the lovers of miraculous events in the days of merry Charles II. then composed of three-fourths of the population of England.

“ There

“ There is a very strange but credible relation from a place called Shewall, in the parish of Stoke Edith, in the county of Hereford; that a woman named Mary Godsall, upon Wednesday the 16th instant July (1679), about an hour before sun-set going as usual to milk her cows, as she was milking, she observed something to fall upon the ground like drops of blood, covering the earth all about her with thick drops of blood; and also the right side of the cow, which she was then milking, was all covered over with blood; and some of the drops fell into her pail of milk, discolouring the milk, and sprinkling all the outside of her pail with blood: upon the sight hereof she was very much astonished and troubled, and immediately took up her pail, and went hastily to her own house, and presently sent for some of her neighbours, whose names the relation saith were, Alice the wife of Philip Hennington, the wife of one Richard Bilby, Margaret the daughter of Edward Chamberlain, and Mrs. Carpenter, the wife of Warncomb Carpenter, and gave them an account of what had happened; they thereupon agreed to go all together to the place that Mary Godsall had related that the blood fell; and when they came thither, they accordingly found it to be true, for they there saw the blood upon the grass in the ground aforesaid, and that not only in the place where the said Mary had milked her cow, but also in several several other places thereabout. She also says further than when she perceived it to continue raining blood some time upon the ground, she cast up her eyes toward the sky, to observe in what manner and from whence the drops of blood came, and that as she was beholding the same, several drops of blood fell upon her face and her neckcloth, which neckcloth she hath since washed, to try if she could wash the blood out, but with all her endeavour she cannot get it out.

“The relation says, that this examination was taken from the aforesaid Mary Godsall upon oath, on Friday the 18th of this instant July, before Richard Hopton, esq. one of his Majesty’s Justices of the Peace for the said county, at his house at Canon-Frome, in the aforesaid county of Hereford.”

Mary Godsall was certainly a poor illiterate observer, and must have accidentally walked into a shower of blood; the miracle could not have been intended for her or the neighbouring cottagers. Sensible of this defect in the inventor, the next fabricator of wonders determined to soar a little higher, and asserted in the following month, “The Portugal Ambassador, being on the top of his house to observe the late eclipse of the moon, espied, as it seemed to him, a flaming sword pendant o’er the house where he stood; and more to assure himself of the verity (he being doubtful that it might be fancy) caused by the dazzling of his eyes by so long looking at the moon, called several others to view the same, and they all agreed in the same opinion, that it was a flaming sword."

The flaming sword suspended in one solitary instance above an Ambassador's residence was to be considered portentous indeed, and deserved enlargement. The editor of "The Domestic Intelligence" profited by the hint, and inserted a frightful account of many flaming swords, which much resembles a dilated description of an Aurora Borealis, though he chose the wrong month for his aërial exhibition, as the solar light is very strong at ten o'clock in July; but let him speak for himself. "There is a relation from Chipping Norton, in Oxfordshire, that on Monday, being the 28th of July last past, about ten o'clock at night, there were seen great flashes of lightning, and as it were flames of fire, though the sky were then very clear, and free from clouds, neither did any thunder, as is usual, accompany it. A while after the inhabitants gazing in the sky, they observed the west part of the Heavens to open as they imagined, and from thence they thought they saw a perfect flaming sword to issue out, which directly pointed to the east; it was of a prodigious magnitude, turning round with a swift motion, as if some strong hand had shaken it; the stars at the same time appearing very red and fiery.

"After

“After this, in another part of the Heavens, another sword (but much larger) appeared to their sight, which soon after disappeared. This appearance of a sword was repeated divers times in several different shapes, one of them seeming more bloody than the rest, and as they could guess was above five yards in length; and all this time it lightened in a very dreadful manner, the lightning running upon the ground, which made the sky very light, though the moon did not shine.

“It continued about an hour and an half, or two hours, and left a very strong sulphurous smell behind it; the truth hereof is attested by Thomas Brown, Elizabeth Greenway, and Ann Gutheridg, inhabitants at Chipping Norton, and eye-witnesses of the same, and was communicated in a letter to Mr. Thomas Colley in West Smithfield in London. We hear also of several other prodigies lately seen in several places; as a blazing star, a fiery circle, and in one place a rainbow was seen at midnight.”

LAUDABLE RESOLUTIONS OF THE INHABITANTS OF LUDGERSAL, 1679.

The conduct of part of the residents in this place had been so extremely riotous and improper during elections for Members of Parliament, that the Grand Jury for Wiltshire thought it their duty to complain of the general intoxication which prevailed at those times of licensed disorder.

Sensible of the truth and propriety of the presentment, and severely feeling the disgrace attached to their borough, certain persons entered into the following resolutions, which were subscribed by the Rector, Churchwardens, Overseers of the Poor, the Constables, a Baronet, and forty-five other inhabitants, and affixed to the Cross in the town. It is to be feared that this is a solitary example of repentance, and a determination to amend electioneering misdeeds.

“ Ludgersal Borough, August 6, 1679.

“ Whereas our town and borough of Ludgersal, in the county of Wilts, hath been lately complained of, and, as we are informed, stands presented for several rudenesses and excessive drinkings; we the inhabitants and parishioners of the same, whose names are subscribed, do protest against and engage ourselves frequently and friendly to meet, consult, and endeavour the preventing (as much as in us lies), all such disorders, and the promoting a public reputation and interest; in reference to which, whosoever shall be at any time propounded, every one shall lovingly acquiesce therein, as it shall be agreed by all, or the major part of us.

“ Now, in pursuance of the forementioned design, it is agreed,

“ That

“That we will jointly procure the severity of the laws against all idle, debauched, and unruly persons, especially Sunday tiplers ;

“That no one shall be encouraged by us to stand for a burghership, but such as shall be of a known good repute and sober demeanour ;

“That we resolve stiffly to oppose him or them, who shall attempt to carry it by outvying, entertainments, briberies, or unbounded drinkings ; and that, in our choice, we will have regard to the merits of the person only ;

“That no one for us shall be put to any charge during the time of their candidateship ; but, on the day of election, after the election is over, if he pleases, he may give this borough, and such friends and gentlemen as shall attend him, some moderate refreshment.

“Whosoever will not cordially concur with us in these commendable resolves, we shall justly look upon him as a most scandalous person, both negligent of his own, and highly injurious to the credit and benefit of this borough.

“Lastly, if any person within the precincts of this borough, not here mentioned, shall be willing to be entered into this sober society, he shall be freely admitted ; or if any man here desires to have his name struck out, he may.”

SINGULAR METHOD OF OBTAINING VOTES.

At the very time the good people of Ludgersal were using their best endeavour to preserve the purity of elections, the Neapolitan Prince Lodovisio was exerting his influence at Naples in a manner as disgraceful to him as the conduct of the Ludgersalians was honourable to them.

This unworthy Prince, wishing to have a certain person elected to the office of a Magistrate, and doubting the success of his honest endeavours, thought of the following curious expedient: he ordered two hundred galley-slaves to be habited in the usual fashions of the citizens, and to give their votes as such. Unfortunately for Lodovisio, the imposition was discovered; the inhabitants of Naples were exasperated almost to rebellion, and were pacified with difficulty by the prudent conduct of the Viceroy, who severely reproved the Prince for his dangerous experiment.

REGICIDE GUN.

The English Intelligencer of August 23d 1679 asserts, "From Windsor we have this following account, that on Wednesday last his Majesty shot in the gun that was lately brought over from Italy to kill him, which was taken by one Captain Salisbury. It makes no report when it goes off, but only flashes in the pan. It is in length length about a yard, stock, &c. and kills at fourscore yards. It is charged with very little powder, and carries a bullet no bigger than a good handsome duck-shot. His Majesty is very well satisfied in the execution of it, for they have tried it upon a dog, and they could not find the orifice, the bullet being so small, and goes through the body. The person who gives this relation says, he himself saw it shot off, and that it carried clear through an inch deal-board, at a considerable distance."

THE CARRIER OF CIRENCESTER'S MIRACLE.

Perhaps more than enough has already been said on the subject of vulgar miracles; but the Carrier of Cirencester and his five passengers have such forcible claims to superior skill in invention, that it is impossible to let their wonders sleep in oblivion with "The Domestic Intelligence, Published to prevent false Reports."

"There is a very credible account that, upon Tuesday the 26th of August last past, the Carrier of Cirencester, with five passengers, coming toward London, about two miles from Abingdon, in the morning immediately after sun-rising they observed in the south part of the heavens the perfect appearance and similitude of a tall man in a sad-coloured habit, brandishing a broadsword in his right hand, which was stretched out toward the south, he seeming to walk that way.

This

This continued for some time plainly visible to them all, and then disappeared; and the sky seemed immediately in the same place to represent a calm sea, with fishes of several forms playing and leaping up and down therein, and a while after seemed to be tempestuous; upon which there presently appeared about an hundred ships of divers shapes and sizes, from whence there seemed some small ships or tenders to be continually plying to seaward, as if they had been sent as spies or advice-boats to the navy. This fleet remained in their sight for near a quarter of an hour, to the great consternation of the spectators; after which the sky cleared again, and then there arose the form of a very high mountain, and several villages, little houses, and woods appeared thereon, and some part thereof appeared plain, upon which they discovered about thirty horsemen well armed with pistols and muskets, which marched toward the villages upon a full trot, but by the rising ground they were soon out of sight, upon which the sky seemed to close again, and return to its usual form and likeness."

A REMARKABLE ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

A Mr. Tyger, of Whitchurch, employed several men to dig a well on his premises in September 1679, which they accomplished, and found a spring at the depth of fifteen ells. At the

the very moment the master-bricklayer was giving directions to lay a frame of wood to commence the wall of the well, great part of the earth near the surface fell, and overwhelmed him and the labourers. Every exertion was immediately made to rescue the supposed dead bodies from their premature interment, but, to the surprise and joy of every spectator, they discovered that the frame had been placed in such a position as to prevent the earth from enclosing the men, and at the same time leaving sufficient space for respiration during the short interval of their confinement.

THE DUKE OF MONMOUTH, HIS HORSE, AND A STAG.

Uncommon as the above escape from sudden death certainly was, the Duke of Monmouth experienced a rescue from the grim tyrant equally extraordinary in the same year and month. His Grace was in pursuit of a stag in Windsor Forest, and in the course of the chace the animal bayed; the Duke pierced him with sword in hand. Smarting with the wound, the stag fled, and sprung across a ditch accompanied by the Duke, with whose horse he came in contact, when both fell. At this instant the unsheathed sword penetrated and passed through the neck of the horse, and grazed that of the Duke, who received a slight wound, but the poor animal bled to death.

THE RIVERS BOYNE AND BLACKWATER.

Rivers in the vicinity of volcanos are frequently interrupted in their progress to the sea by subterraneous convulsions. It sometimes happens that similar occurrences arrest the attention of the Philosopher in countries very remote from volcanos. Many instances might be given of this phenomena; but the aberration of the Boyne in 1679 will be sufficient for the present purpose. The river just mentioned, and the Blackwater, affected by the same unknown impulse, suddenly ceased to flow, and continued motionless for three days; in which time the adjacent country was completely overflowed, several cottages destroyed, and many cattle lost, when the water of each found a new course, and finally joined a mile above the town of Nivan, twenty miles from Dublin, leaving an incredible number of fish on the surface of the country which had been deluged.

Admitting this account to be correct, there are several causes that might produce the stagnation, originating from confined air, or subterranean water. Suppose a stream to have passed immediately under the spot where the rivers ceased to flow, and that stream suddenly increased, the earth above must experience an inconsiderable rise, yet sufficient to render the beds of the rivers a level, and perhaps occasion a slight declination towards towards the source. Confined air would have the same effect in rushing through caverns beneath, if impeded; and each upon being released would admit the imperceptible sinking of the earth to its former place, and the consequent re-flowing of the two rivers.

This phenomenon is recorded in the "True Domestic Intelligence," Sept. 9, 1679.

GRAND ILLUMINATION AT BRUSSELS.

The customs of Nations differ, in many cases, almost as much as the features of the natives. It is singular that the ideas of man upon any given subject do not more frequently coincide than experience convinces us they do not. Even in the trivial circumstance of illuminating a city, the difference between foreign and the British practice is very conspicuous. This will be demonstrated by describing the orders of the Duke De Villa Hermosa, issued to the Magistrates of Brussels in 1679, for the rejoicings on the marriage of the King of Spain to Mademoiselle De Orleans. "In pursuance thereof," says the Editor of the Domestic Intelligence, "they have already erected a great stage against the Town-house, whereon pitched barrels and excellent fire-works are to be shewn. The Town-house is to be hung with scarlet, under which there are white wax candles to be set in silver candlesticks; candlesticks ; and the tower of St. Michael's is to be hung with lanterns from top to bottom."

CELEBRATION OF THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING OF SPAIN AND MARIA LOUISA DE BOURBON, 1679.

This magnificent spectacle was attended by circumstances so very different from modern custom, that our festivities shrink into comparative insignificance. The Court was at Fontainbleau, where the ceremony began by the Grand Monarque receiving the congratulations of the principal nobility habited in the most splendid manner and sparkling with jewels. The public cryer gave notice to the inhabitants of the town, that they were expected to illuminate their houses three successive nights, on the first of which a brilliant firework was exhibited before the king. On the 10th of September a Mascara, or Masque, commenced at eight in the evening, composed of one hundred of the nobles of France, well mounted and uniformly dressed in crimson taffeta richly laced with silver, each bearing a torch of white wax, and attended by numerous lacquies.

The Captains of this grand troop of horsemen were the Constable of Castille, Major-domo, and the Duke of Medina Celi, Chamberlain to the King of Spain. Those noblemen were preceded by forty of their own footmen in rich liveries, with plumes of white feathers in their hats, and torches in their hands, and numerous trumpets and kettle-drums sounded martial musick before them in a procession through the principal places of the town. During their progress, the King witnessed a second display of fire-works, but the most superb was reserved for the night of the 11th, when a vast scaffold, eighteen feet high, erected before the gate of the palace, exhibited an enormous statue of combustibles, representing the Colossus at Rhodes, bearing a globe in one hand and a sun in the other, with a ship under the legs. On either side of this figure were large castles of the same materials. The Colossus burnt for a quarter of an hour, after which several men came out of the castles, and fought with missive fire that communicated to the castles and at length consumed them.

DREADFUL STORM ON THE CONTINENT.

Our predecessors in news-paper inditing seem to have had two objects in view, to inform and surprize; the matter-of-fact moderns of the same profession like an opportunity to indulge now and then; and the stock-jobbers feeling a propensity in some degree similar, they proceed together very tolerably for a few days, when they are generally kind enough to contradict themselves, or gently do away their misinformation, and begin anew.

Judging

Judging from an attentive perusal of hundreds of old newspapers, we may safely infer that the writers for them had a much easier task in pleasing the publick than those of our time: we are too fastidiously incredulous, and should not be at all contented with a storm from Venice, dressed with so many singularities as the ensuing; though, it must be confessed, some of the papers for September 1807 appear emulous to follow those of 1680, when describing the extraordinary effects of a hurricane in Scotland, which had an uncommon predilection for wheat, and accordingly contrived to sweep thousands of sheaves into a number of rivers of that country, to be borne they best know where, for the benefit of — Corndealeters.

“ From Venice they write, that a relation is published there, of the sad and dismal effects of a great whirlwind or hurricane that has lately happened in several places in the Empire; a brief and true account whereof take as followeth. On the 29th of August last past, there arose a terrible wind near a place called Villa de Fanvis, which was so very strong that it blew divers people that were mowing in the fields, together with their carts and oxen, into the air; several trees were blown up by the roots; and in those places where this wind had power, the ground was so parched and dried up, that neither herb, grass, nor any other other green thing remained upon it. At another village it demolished several houses, blowing the rafters and boards into the air, which in their fall wounded divers persons, but none mortally.

“The roof of a church also, and part of the walls, were blown down, and the bells were blown so far that they were not found next day. It utterly ruined several great palaces, laying them all in rubbish, wounding and killing divers persons, and destroying many beasts in the fields.

“At another village it broke open the door of a coach-house, though treble locked, and drove a coach a considerable height against a brick wall, carrying away the roof half a mile off, many men and women being killed there also. From thence it passed to another village, and made an utter depopulation, destroying all in its way, both men, cattle, and houses, and what further mischief it hath done, we do not yet hear. This hath caused great amazement in the people, it being a very prodigious thing to see beams, trees, pieces of walls, men, women, children, household stuff, hens, eggs, cattle, rats and mice, all carried up into the air together, with such a dreadful noise, as raised a terrible consternation in the spectators.”

This extravagant farrago of falsehoods, intermixed with possibilities, might be pronounced a coarse jest, were it not known that our Courts of Justice

Justice were solemnly employed at the same instant in examining charges of witchcraft, and sentencing poor aged women to dreadful punishments for riding through the air on broomstuffs, and piercing wax figures with pins.

ANTIENT GAMBOLS OF A RIVULET NORTH OF LONDON.

This little neglected and almost forgotten stream, which flows from Highgate-hill in muddy mood, “ever and anon” concealed by arches of brick, and again appearing blackened by vile fluids issuing from many a sewer, still sometimes increases into consequence, and overflows its banks; but it has long ceased such performances as are recorded of it in the “News from Town and Country” of Tuesday, Oct. 14, 1679.

“From the hills on the North side of this city, the water, occasioned by the late great rains, fell so violently in a little brook (which runs through part of the suburbs until it dischargeth itself into the grate at Holborn-bridge), with that impetuosity that overflowed; so that it bore down the back-parts of several wholesale butchers’ houses at Cow-cross, and carried all sorts of cattle, alive and dead; particularly three oxen, some sheep, and many hogs, were so swiftly carried by the violence of the stream, that they never stopped until they came to the above-named grate.

“At

“At Hockley-in-the-hole, it overflowed so that it carried away all sorts of household utensils: a pot boiling was borne off the fire, and carried away by the stream so steadily that the cover kept on; an hungry fellow going to seize it, making too much haste, stumbled upon it, and overturned it, but it retained so much of its heat that it scalded his legs under water. Several barrels of ale and beer, and some of brandy, swam about, some of which the most venturous of the rabble made a wreck of. One butcher at Cow-cross (besides he that lost the three oxen) lost ten hides, which lay one upon another; and hath not yet heard of them.”

FATAL INSTANCE OF MALICE IN 1679.

Two young gentlemen of respectable families, resident at Lewes in Sussex, were remarkably attached to each other; and Roberts and Brinckhurst considered themselves in the light of brothers, till some unfortunate dissention developed the character of the former, and exhibited him as one of the most malignant of human beings. Roberts came to London, and contrived a cowardly scheme against the life of his late friend, which, had it fully succeeded, must have caused the ignominious punishment of an innocent person.

He purchased a quantity of poison sufficient for his intended purpose, and making a parcel,

wrote a letter as if from an acquaintance Brinckhurst had [in the Metropolis, adding J. N. the initials of his name. This letter, alluding to some internal disease which Roberts knew B. wished to be relieved from, recommended the powder as a certain remedy. Pleased with a prospect of relief, the poor victim of this horrid artifice, forgetting the displeasure he had felt for Roberts, and finding the villain was returned to Lewes, waited upon him, and shewed him a letter of thanks he had written to J. N. in which he enquired whether the powder sent was to be taken at once or at different times.

Roberts saw the necessity of securing the letter, and offered to give it to the carrier himself; instead of which he destroyed the note, and wrote another as if from J. N. declaring the necessity of taking the whole of the powder at once. Thus assured, Brinckhurst swallowed the deadly drug, and became extremely ill. Strange, indeed, was the settled malice and fortitude of Roberts, who so completely subdued his feelings as to attend his victim, and with that apparent solicitude and affection which completely banished suspicion; and procured himself a legacy of 50*l.* besides other articles of value from his dying friend. On the third day, Brinckhurst breathed his last. Roberts, still undismayed, actually assisted in the preparations for interment, and in carrying the body to the grave.

As

As it was evident the powder caused the death of the young gentleman, every circumstance connected with it was carefully investigated; the letters supposed to have been written by J. N. were ascertained to be composed in a manner so little according with the abilities of the party, that he was immediately cleared, when several facts occurring to recollection respecting the conduct of Roberts, he was apprehended; and being examined by a Justice of the Peace, he confessed his guilt. In the course of this process, he was asked the name of the drug employed; affecting ignorance, he declared he knew not, but should be enabled to point it out from any number of poisons arranged before him. Several were immediately procured, and he began to balance them in his hand as if to judge by their weight. The moment he lifted the yellow arsenick, he threw as much as possible into his mouth; and making violent efforts, he forced a sufficient quantity into his stomach to baffle every antidote, and he expired in dreadful torture four days afterwards.

LEWIS XIV. AND THE BISHOP OF CONDON.

The Bishop had been appointed tutor to the Dauphin, and being a liberal-minded prelate, he furnished his pupil with books calculated to enlarge the mind, and render the future king the father and not the tyrant of his people. Amongst those was the History of Henry IV. the illustrious great-grandfather of the Prince, written by the bishop of Rodez. In order to impress the Dauphin in the most forcible manner, the good tutor marked several passages; but when the former had arrived at the relation of the dreadful massacre at Paris in the reign of Charles IX. he enlarged upon the enormity of the act, and endeavoured to demonstrate that a king could not commit a more serious offence against Heaven than by sacrificing his subjects to the bigoted suggestions of his own mind, or those of advisers equally cruel and erroneous in their ideas of religion.

At the same time, he pointed out the exemplary punishment which in the instance alluded to, and in every other, invariably attended the guilty perpetrators.

Deeply impressed by the eloquent and energetic arguments of the Prelate, the Dauphin eagerly acquainted the Grand Monarque with his new sentiments and feelings. Enraged at the progress made in the enlightening of his son's mind, Louis sent for the tutor, and grossly charged him with teaching the youth heresy, and attempting to make him a complete Huguenot, concluding with his commands that he never again appeared in his presence. Such was the Christian charity of the worthy Prelate, and such the intolerant spirit of his Royal Master!

UNCOMMON ROBBERY AT MIDDLEBURGH, IN 1679.

The three sons of a Merchant, resident in the above town, and Isle of Walcheren, actuated by a most extraordinary impulse of depravity, resolved to rob their father. In the accomplishment of this horrid purpose, they had recourse to stratagem, and waited till their parent attended divine service; when they seized their sister and a servant maid, whom they confined in a chamber, and proceeded to rifle the compting-house and an iron chest, from which they obtained a large sum of money and several bars of silver.

Anxious for their safety, they immediately fled to a boat provided by their servants, intending to cross the river at a place called the Ramesis. At this critical moment, they perceived the Magistrates had received information of the robbery, and that they were closely pursued; one of these unnatural sons, becoming desperate through fear, commanded the unfortunate waterman to row the boat to the shore; but, receiving a positive refusal, he was shot, and died immediately. The brothers then kept their previous course.

The officers of the Police were intimidated by observing the fate of the boatman, and returned for assistance, which they obtained by boarding a shallop just arrived at the Ramesis with an English nobleman and his suite; who volunteering their services, their number amounted to fourteen fourteen persons. The vessel, urged forward by every possible exertion, soon came along-side of the boat; the brothers were summoned to surrender, and refused. The nobleman and the commander of the shallop leaped on board: the latter was shot dead in an instant; but others following, two servants of the brothers were killed, and one of the triumvirate wounded; after which the wretches were secured without further difficulty.

It is singular that neither the names of the brothers, nor of the Englishman, are mentioned in the publication whence this narrative was compiled; nor is the fate of the survivors noticed. The intelligence is said to have reached England in letters from the Hague.

THE PORT OF CALAIS BLOCKADED BY A WHALE.

One of those odd accidents, which almost seem to be the result of design, warmly excited the interest of the opposite inhabitants of England and France in November 1679. The entrance of the harbour of Calais was then, and probably still is, extremely narrow; consequently but one vessel could pass at the same time, and not without considerable skill in the pilot, aided by the highest flow of the tide.

A ship just arrived from Amsterdam entered the mouth of the harbour under sail, but suddenly received a violent shock, which repelled her her back again with great force, to the astonishment of the crew, who moored the vessel in the roads, resolved to wait for the next tide; when a second attempt was made, with the same result, and some damage to the ship. The Captain, determined to examine into the cause of so unexpected an obstruction, sent the long-boat, well manned, at low water, to sound about the place where the accident occurred. The men employed on this occasion immediately discovered a full-grown whale, which lay lifeless directly across the channel, whence they concluded that the first blow from the ship's head had proved fatal to the enormous fish. The Magistrates of the town gave instant directions to have it cut to pieces and removed.

AN APPARITION!!!

The first we have introduced to the reader, whose appearance was most wonderful, and certainly not less futile. Fearful, however, that any comments of our own might injure the credit due to the narrator, we shall let him appear and speak in his proper person.

Mr. Ben. Harris, "of the Stationers' Arms in the Piazza under the Royal Exchange," saith in his Domestic Intelligence for December 9, 1679:

"There was an account in our last of the untimely death of Henry Sturgis, keeper of White-chapel Prison, who hanged himself in the Rope-yard yard on Saturday last, about two o'clock in the afternoon; since which, we have this wonderful, yet most credible relation, that about seven or eight of the clock in the evening of the same day, one Richard Reyley, victualler in Shadwell-market, near the new Church, going home from London over Whitechapel fields, when he came near the ponds, upon a sudden he observed a flame of fire arising out of the pond like lightning, and presently after he meets the appearance of the said Sturgis coming over a ditch toward him, who said, 'Get you out of the way, or I will throw you into the pond.' The man wondered very much at the affront, being acquainted with Sturgis; and, not having heard of his fatal end, was therefore just going to ask him the reason of it, when of an instant his hat was thrown off his head; which while he stooped to take up, the Fantasm disappeared, which the man much admired at; and, going over the next fields, there were several persons in the rope-walks, he gave them an account of what had passed; whereupon they informed him the said Sturgis had hanged himself in that place several hours before. The man was very angry, positively asserting that he had just now met him alive and in health; but, to convince him, they shewed him the dead body; whereupon his countenance immediately turned pale and wan, and he went home extremely frightened, though a man otherwise of undaunted courage; courage; and, when he came home, he swooned away, and could hardly be recovered, and has continued ever since in a very distracted condition, not having slept for divers nights together. Those who doubt the truth hereof may be fully satisfied therein at his house aforementioned."

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY.

The newspapers, at the close of the year 1679, announced the finding of a large anchor by some persons who were digging at Pilgethaven in Northamptonshire. The situation of this place is said to be upwards of 30 miles from the sea; but, as the spot where the anchor lay buried is a valley, and the word haven being attached to the name of Pilget, the speculators of the time inferred that the Ocean had at some remote period flowed through the valley.

NOTHING BUT DRUNK,

Is the title of one of the elder Dibdin's songs, the idea of which, though not taken from the subject of this article, seems well suited to it. If the circumstances of the following relation are founded on fact, they are indeed astonishing; if they were fabricated, the author of them will be allowed competent to have undertaken any thing in the way of romance.

"Very

“ Very near a little village (being a fisher-town) in Yorkshire, between Scarborough and Burlington, a French vessel of considerable burthen, laden with French wines, brandy, prunes, and sugar, bound for Newcastle, struck upon a rock with such force that she lay upon the point of the rock as it were equally poised, it having struck through the middle of her keel, so that she lay immovable by the waves when the tide was out.

“ The fishermen with their cobbles and five men’s boats fetched off the men, and unladed the vessel, which so filled that little town with hogsheads, that a horse could not pass in the town; nor men, without getting over them. The poor people surfeited so with wine and brandy that near half the town, men, women, and children, lay drunk upon the sands, of which excess several of them have since died.

“ Next day, the country people adjacent, hearing of the wreck, came down in multitudes to partake of the spoil, when every one might drink what he would; for, partly through the seamen’s gratitude for the preserving of their lives, and what the people got by force and theft, there was no lett to any person, so that the plenty was great, and the company that flocked to the town increasing hourly, that they burnt brandy in their brewing kettles, stewed prunes in their coppers, and

and threw in sugar with shovels; so that it is believed more people are already killed, and will die by surfeits gotten by the brandy, than would have been lost if the sea had swallowed all the men in the ship. A poor child, that in all probability never tasted brandy before, drinking a full draught of it as if it had been beer, was immediately stifled, and never spoke word more.

“Two men, father and son, slept about sixteen hours, as if they had been dead; and when they were with much difficulty awaked, the father died some few hours after; the son recovered, but continues as it were distracted, and it is thought will never be in his senses again. The ship could not possibly be gotten off, but most of the rigging, and what was most material, was saved; the vessel being broken by the following tides.” Domestic Intelligence, 1679.

Two instances may be cited in support of the credibility of this narrative: the dreadful infatuation of part of Lord George Gordon's mob, who set fire to Langdale's distillery in Holborn, 1780, and then drank the raw spirits in the cellar till they were intoxicated and buried in the falling ruins, exclusive of others who died in the streets through excessive drinking; and more recently, during a fire in Store-street, at a Brewery, the populace drank beer with such perseverance that numbers lay insensible for some hours hours in the neighbouring streets ; but it does not appear that any of them lost their lives.

THE FLESH versus THE SPIRIT.

It often happens that discord attends the married pair who are of different faiths in religion ; but those persons, contemporary with the origin of Quakerism, were most unfortunately situated when either husband or wife adopted the tenets of that precise sect without accomplishing the conversion of their helpmates. The revolution in dress and manners was so violent, that human faculties were too weak to restrain the disgust on either side. It was death to the convert to see the vain gaudy attire of the world constantly before him or her, and quite impossible not to condemn or reprobate it and the wearer ; and it was equally impossible for a gay and dissipated man or woman to hear reproof from the lips of sanctity, so suddenly acquired, and to which they were so nearly allied, without resentment.

Many whimsical yet serious dissensions must have arisen from this source, and no doubt much real misery. The tale which follows was published in 1680, at the very moment when "convincement" daily increased the disciples of Penn, and may possibly be founded on fact ; or if not, it must be allowed the merit of

happily illustrating the war of the flesh against the spirit.

“ On Christmas-day, in the morning, a person of considerable rank, the better to grace the solemnity of the day, would put on his velvet coat; but his wife, being a Quaker, was much averse to it, using many arguments against it; but the most forcible was, she had got the key of the trunk wherein his cloaths were, and would not deliver it; upon which he broke open the trunk: but she, being precautions of that likewise, had before-hand conveyed the coat out of the trunk, and hid it. He being very angry to be thus disappointed, and finding some ribands in the trunk, he apparels himself as well as he could without his velvet, and presently goes to a Miss whom he kept, and presented her with the ribands.

“ His wife, observing him to go out in such a passion, sent her maid after him to see whither he went, who presently brought her word whither he was gone. Upon which the wife, enraged with jealousy, went to the place, and surprised the woman with the ribands in her hand. The poor harlot, all amazed, made direct answer to all interrogatories, and, amongst other things, confessed that the person who gave her the ribands had too familiar acquaintance with her, and allowed her a weekly maintenance.

“ Upon

“ Upon this discovery, the wife gets a warrant both for her husband and the harlot, and caused them to be brought before a Justice of the Peace, who committed the husband to the Gatehouse, and the Miss to Bridewell. The husband was exceedingly enraged that his wife should cause him to be imprisoned, and threatened to be revenged when he was released; which his wife hearing of, went to her husband, begged his pardon, and promised to persuade the Justice to set him at liberty if he would forgive her; but he swore he would never forgive her.

“ Upon which, she knowing his revengeful disposition, and that he would not be long kept in durance in the Gatehouse, goes and prepares for his reception in Bethlehem, and then goes to the Justice, and acquaints him that her husband was lunatic, and desired his release from the Gatehouse, that he might be conveyed to another place more proper for his distemper, which the Justice granted: and she having provided two lusty fellows for the purpose, immediately upon his coming out of the Gatehouse, he was clapped into a coach, and conveyed to Bethlehem, where he now remains.”

FALL OF DOVER CLIFFS.

It is a subject of regret that the successive Governors of the Castle of Dover were not commanded by our Monarchs since the Conquest to to register in their books of office the repeated falls of chalk and earth which have occurred in consequence of the violence of the sea at the base of the cliffs, and the operations of frost and sudden thawys on the surface of them.

Had an opportunity been thus afforded of computing the number of acres lost to the country in the course of eight hundred years, we should undoubtedly find by inference that Cæsar crossed a much narrower channel than that of the present day. The London Gazette for January 12, 1679-80, records a most remarkable loss of territory, under the date of Dover, January 8. "We have had here extreme stormy weather, accompanied by much rain, the wind generally at West; and the last night, or this morning, happened a great fall of the cliff, adjoining to the North wall of the Castle, and at the North side of the said wall, called The Castle-rear.

"It is in breadth about thirty rods, and in length little less; that at high-water it may be twenty-five rods in the sea, and the height is about twenty feet, in all places much alike. It is judged this fall of the cliff (the greatest in the memory of any man living) will be a means to secure and lodge the beach or shingle thrown up into the bay, which is the only preservation of the harbour."

PECULATION DURING THE PLAGUE!!!

When the city of Vienna was afflicted by that dreadful disorder in 1679, the keeper of the Pest-house had the avarice and inhumanity to declare he received two hundred and forty persons into his care in the month of November more than was actually the fact. An instance of turpitude so near the jaws of death almost without parallel!

On the 14th of the following April the physicians of that city made an experiment in order to ascertain whether a sufficient quantity of earth had been placed above the bodies buried during the prevalence of the disorder. They tied a dog to a stake driven into the ground where upwards of one thousand persons lay piled on each other, and the animal died in half an hour.

THE DUKE OF MONMOUTH

Happened to pass in his coach through Chancery-lane in January 1680, at the moment when a person fired a musket from his residence. The attendants very naturally supposed it to be an unsuccessful attempt to assassinate the Duke; and immediately assaulted a porter who stood near them, the real offender having thrown the gun down, and fled; but, recollecting himself, he returned, and, falling on his knees, begged the Duke's pardon, declaring he had merely been trying the state of the musket.

There

There are two circumstances in this Anecdote worthy of notice; the firing of a gun during the day in a public street as a matter of indifference with respect to common passengers, and the humiliating abject position of the citizen when asking pardon. The change of manners, in the interval between this occurrence and the present time, is obviously in our favour. Of the numerous Volunteers and other persons now possessed of muskets, can one be pointed out as having thus offended against law and propriety? or, if one could be found so lost to the feelings of passengers, would all the rank and splendour of the Court bring him upon his knees?

PARISIAN POISONERS IN 1679 AND 80.

A number of inhuman wretches, part of the French nobility, and persons of fashion, had formed a systematic method of removing their enemies, their offspring, and those who interposed between them and hereditary honours or estates. An Englishman of 1810, and of honourable descent, cannot thoroughly comprehend the baseness and depravity of soul necessary to execute the deliberate death of an unsuspecting victim. It is true, we have in our Annals some instances of poisoning; but they have always been solitary, and with long intervals between each case: besides, the perpetrators were generally in the lower ranks of life.

The Government of France, having received information of the practices carried on to accomplish the removal of many respectable persons, established a chamber of Justice for the trial of those apprehended on charges, or suspicion, of administering poison. The publications of the time declare their proceedings to have been secret, and consequently merely mention the result. Madame Latignan, who had poisoned her husband, Madame Ferroy, and Madame Brizac, were sentenced to lose their heads; Madame Dreux was sent to the Bastille for nine years*; the Marquis de Sellac Clermont received the same destination, but he escaped at the time: above two hundred others fled to avoid the scrutiny their conduct would not bear. The above Nobleman was summoned by sound of trumpet before his house at Paris and in the markets, together with the Countess of Soissons, Madame de Sourdys, and Madame de Alluy.

La Voisine appears to have acted one of the most diabolical parts in this shocking pursuit; her sentence was dreadful, too dreadful even for a deliberate compounder of poisonous drugs. She was dragged to the Church of Notre Dame in

* Her husband offered 9000*l.* to any female who would consent to become her attendant during that long period.

Paris upon a sledge, without any other covering than her shift, where she performed penance, bearing a lighted torch in her hand, and fortitude in her countenance, whence the officers of justice conveyed her to the place of execution. The vast crowd collected there to witness her body consumed, their curses, and the sight of the fire, deprived her in an instant of all her resolution; and she seized the sledge with such muscular exertion, that the united efforts of five men were required to force her into the flames. Her screams terrified the hearers; and she vehemently repeated her previous accusations of various persons, to whom she added her own son and daughter, declaring they possessed the secret of preparing potent poisons: but the two last escaped.

Madame Trianon is said to have surpassed La Voisine in wickedness; in whose lodgings were found eight pounds of arsenic, sixty phials of deadly liquids, and a book of recipes for their composition.

Madame Guillard, the wife of a counsellor, the Dowager Countess of Soissons, and the Sieur De Berlise, son of the Master of the Ceremonies at Court, were implicated, fled, and summoned to appear by sound of trumpet. The Duchess of Bouillon treated the Judges with contempt during her trial, and was confined with great rigour by the King's express command.

To conclude this detestable catalogue: the Duke of Luxemburgh is said to have confessed, that a priest and himself prevailed upon an infamous woman to extend herself on the altar of his chapel, and submit to have a wafer consecrated on her person, which was intended as a charm to procure the Duke success in his amours; and that he was concerned with La Voisine the accoucheur in procuring abortions, and making virgin parchment of the skins of infants, on which to write charms for the removal of those whose lives were required by the fraternity.

The British public, amazed at these almost incredible horrors, made them the constant theme of conversation; and the names of the wretches were pronounced by every tongue with execration. The editors of Newspapers, ever upon the watch for remarkable events, conveyed those to their readers in rapid succession; and, fearful that the fate of Parisian poisoners might be received with less interest than the acts of Englishmen employed in the same pursuits, they resolved to invent similar stories.

How inferior are even the *imagination*s of the sons of Albion to those of their Gallic neighbours! The latter poisoned with astonishing facility: the former, infinitely less enlightened, fabricated the following silly tale, evidently the composition of a mere novice in the grand conceptions of a Trianon, a Voisine, or a Luxemburgh: in short,

it must be acknowledged, we were centuries behind our enemies in this art.

“ We have of late had very strange reports of the poisonings in France, the relations of which are so monstrous that they are almost incredible; but, by a circumstance which lately passed in a Tavern near Cripplegate, the possibility is the more credible. A person who spoke good English (but, by his tone and mien, supposed to be a Frenchman), came to the said Tavern, and bade him shew him a room. The drawer having shewed him a room, asked him what he pleased to drink?

“ He told him he would drink no wine of his drawing, and bade him call another. When the other came, he embraced him closely with seeming great affection; and, laying his cheek to his, the drawer thought he was about to whisper with him, but the gentleman put his tongue in his mouth: upon which the drawer got from him, and going down stairs, he called to him, and bade him bring a pint of sack; but the drawer refused to carry it up, telling his master how he had been served, who thereupon sent up another drawer with it.

“ The gentleman immediately drank off the sack, and came to the bar and paid for it, saying he staid for other company, but they not coming, he would stay no longer. The drawer, immediately after the kiss, found a sharp pricking upon his his tongue, and within an hour fell stark mad, and so continues, to the great astonishment of all that know him."

SPECIMEN OF EXALTED CHARITY.

This shall be given verbatim from "The True Domestic Intelligence" of March 5, 1680.

"The Lord Bertlet, who liveth in St. John's near Clerkenwell, out of his generous bounty, hath proffered not only to lay out the money for redemption of the English captives in Algiers, until it be raised by the brief his Majesty hath granted for that purpose, but also to go himself in person to treat for their ransoms, and accordingly is making preparation for his voyage."

EARTHQUAKE AT MALAGA IN 1680.

This unfortunate city experienced most fatally that earthquakes have a centre whence the concussion becomes weakened, till at length the effects are harmless. A shock was felt at Madrid on the 9th of October, which was perceived at Cadiz, Seville, and other places, without producing any material injury to those cities: at Malaga, on the contrary, the motion continued eight minutes, in which short period 871 houses were completely destroyed, 1,259 rendered uninhabitable; and of 6,000, the number composing the city, it was supposed not 300 escaped partial derangement.

Eighteen convents, four hospitals, a college of Seminarists, and a parish-church, were so completely shaken that the greater part were considered beyond the possibility of repair; nor were the palaces of the Governor and Bishop exempted from the general calamity. At the moment this melancholy detail appeared in the London Gazette, it had been ascertained that 40 persons were killed and 112 wounded; but it was well known that considerable numbers laid concealed under the ruins.

EARTHQUAKE AND FIRE AT SMYRNA, 1688.

The reader will, perhaps, be pleased to have it in his power to compare the effects of this species of phenomena at places so remotely separated as Smyrna and Malaga. The fatal event, which is the subject of the present article, occurred between the hours of eleven and twelve at noon, on the last day of June; and, in one minute, Nature accomplished the destruction of buildings which years of patient perseverance had merely served to complete.

Numbers of houses fell, and it was supposed not a single habitation escaped uninjured. The neighbourhood of Smyrna felt the shock with abated violence, and the islands of Meteline and Scio suffered but slightly. At Constantinople, the concussion was just perceptible, and on the same day. The great church of Smyrna, where the Metropolitan, the Patriarch of Alexandria, and several Papas or Reverend Fathers, had assembled to prayers, became a mass of ruins in an instant, and buried those unfortunate priests and their auditors.

The Jews lost 400 of their number, and Aron Aben Haim, a Rabbi of uncommon sanctity, greatly honoured during his life, and sincerely regretted after this unexpected termination of it. To these victims the accounts add 5000 nameless persons as a moderate calculation.

Four hours after the ruin of the city had been partially completed, a fire broke out in the Genoese house, situated in the Frank Street. The wind happened unfortunately to be high; and the consternation of the survivors preventing the least exertion to check the flames, they soon destroyed the street just named, and all the town spared by the earthquake, except some scattered buildings in the suburbs, and on the declivity forming part of the site of the town.

The British Consul, and half of the English residents, happened to be absent from their houses, and, upon the first alarm, went on board the ships consigned to or owned by them; through which fortunate circumstance but three of their lives were lost, though several were severely bruised. Equally upon the alert, after the danger appeared to have subsided, the British merchants succeeded in saving much of their merchandize, chandize, by sending it on board the different vessels. The Dutch had no ships then in port, and their loss was considerable from the fire; but only one merchant of that nation perished, and of the French the Consul.

There were many warehouses in a part of the town called Viserchan: the lower ranges of those escaped destruction; the upper were burnt, and generally fell in consequence of the clefts made in the walls by the earthquake, which caused the total disappearance of the Castle at St. Giacomo's point.

The Sublime Porte, careful of its own interest, sent a Capigee Bashi * from Constantinople to seize upon such property as had no claimants through the sudden deaths of its possessors; but our Court Gazette gives no intimation that this officer received orders to relieve the distressed survivors of the calamity. The British Ambassador, more attentive to his duty, procured a permission from the Grand Vizier to send an agent commissioned to render his countrymen every assistance in his power.

The first number of the Orange Gazette, which appeared December 31, 1688, contains still further particulars relating to Smyrna, the necessary but dreadful result of the misfortunes of the inhabitants. It may be supposed that every effort within the possibility of accomplishment was made by the Agent to serve the British at Smyrna. The place, however, became so extremely unhealthy that, after four of the Factory had died of the prevailing diseases, the Consul and half of his countrymen embarked themselves and property and sailed for England, leaving the remainder scattered in the adjacent villages waiting the fate of numbers of Greeks, Armenians, Franks, and Jews, who daily fell victims to the shocking effluvia arising from the dead through the chasms of the rubbish which overwhelmed them.

To complete the catalogue of evils, the town was deprived of fresh water by the destruction of the aqueducts.

The annexed view of Smyrna was copied from a very good print of that place, drawn before this calamity occurred, forming the back ground to the reception of the French Consul, inserted in Dumont's Travels, published almost at the precise period of the Earthquake.

FASHIONS, 1680.

Fashion, variable as the wind, has ever been a subject for ridicule, or serious animadversion, Queen Elizabeth treated it in a most despotic manner; but, as ill-humour and authoritative strictures are foreign to this work, it will not surely give offence if some "Infernal" observations are introduced, by which a knowledge of the follies of 1680 may be obtained; and for those those we are indebted to “The Mercurius Infernus: or News from the other World, discovering the cheats and abuses of this: being all truth in fable.”

“Phlegeton, March 15. One would think Don Pluto should be kind to women, because of their kindness to him in betraying mankind, or at least for his dear wife’s sake, both a woman and born of a woman. But we find the contrary; for, after a long journey, returning home the other day, and going to kiss his Empress, he found her so transmogrified that he hardly knew her; for she had got upon her forehead a huge monstrous crisped and curled powdered tower, her cheeks all of a pure vermillion hue, bepatched with coaches and horses, half moons, and black stars. Smelling to her breast, they stunk of jesmine and orange-flower water, after a prodigious manner. ‘Ave Maria,’ quoth Don Pluto, ‘what’s come to my wife?’ He observed that when she was undressing herself, she not only pulled off her tower, but her whole head of hair too, and laid it in her dressing-box.

“Thereupon he began to question the matter. Proserpine told him, that her doctor had advised her, for a pain that she had in her head, to cut off her hair. ‘Doctor!’ quoth the Devil, ‘and have you paid his fees?’ ‘No,’ quoth she, ‘persons of quality, you know, never pay till it comes to a sum.’ ‘Then I will pay him his sum total with with a vengeance,' quoth Don Pluto. 'But who made you these gingombobs,' quoth he. 'Oh,' quoth she, 'here are lately come among us a certain sort of she-people, the rarest that ever were known to set out women's beauties. They call themselves Tirewomen, and told me that all the women in the other world dress themselves in this manner, and that it was the fashion.'

"'Oh,' quoth the Devil, 'new fashions, new gallants, wife.' That night he lay still, and said no more. The next morning, sending for the Doctor, 'Sirrah,' quoth he, 'I heard say, that some of you Doctors are the greatest pandars in the world; and you must certainly be one of those, by these endeavours of yours to bring your new customs, new fangles, into my territories; I know how vicious the other world is grown, and that these are the baits and allurements of their debauchery.'

CELEBRATION OF ST. MARK'S DAY AT VENICE.

All our travellers agree, that the gaiety and splendour exhibited in the place of St. Mark at Venice, on St. Mark's day, is extremely attractive. Every method has been contrived for ages to do honour to this the Patron Saint of the city; and, amongst other singular customs, a man ascends and descends the tower dedicated to him on the frail support of a rope stretched from the summit, and secured at a considerable distance from from the base. Having thus introduced the subject, we shall submit the following improved account of it, written in 1680.

“ Venice, March 7. The last day of the last month, the Doge, the Senate, and the Imperial Ambassador, with above 50,000 common spectators, beheld the solemnity of St. Mark. In the first place, appeared certain butchers, in their roast-meat clothes ; one of which, with a Persian scymetar, cut off the heads of three oxen, one after another, at one blow, to the admiration of all beholders, who had never seen the like either in this city, or in any other part of the world : but that which caused a greater wonder in the spectators was this, that a certain person, adorned in a tinsel riding habit, having a gilt helmet upon his head, and holding in his right hand a lance, in his left a helmet made of a thin piece of plate gilded, and sitting upon a white horse, with a swift pace ambled up a rope 600 feet long, fastened from the quay to the top of St. Mark’s tower : being got half way, his coat, which was of tinsel, happening to fall off, he made a stand, and stooping his lance submissively, saluted the Doge sitting in the Palace, and flourished the banner three times over his head.

“ Then, resuming his former speed, he went on, and, with his horse, entered the tower where the bell hangs ; and presently returning on foot, he climbed up to the highest pinnacle of the tower ;

tower ; where, sitting on the golden angel, he flourished his banner again several times, and so returning down to the tower ; and there taking horse, he rode down again to the very bottom. Next year he promises to ride up to the same tower with a cart and two oxen."

"Whoever," says Mrs. Piozzi, "sees St. Mark's Place lighted up of an evening, adorned with every excellence of human art, and pregnant with pleasure, expressed by intelligent countenances sparkling with every grace of nature ; the sea washing its walls, the moon-beams dancing on its subjugated waves, sport and laughter resounding from the coffee-houses, girls with guitars skipping about the square, masks and merry-makers singing as they pass you, unless a barge with a band of music is heard at some distance upon the water, and calls attention to sounds made sweeter by the element over which they are brought ; whoever is led suddenly, I say, to this scene of seemingly perennial gaiety, will be apt to cry out of Venice, as Eve says to Adam in Milton :

With thee conversing, I forget all time,
All seasons, and their change—all please alike!"

THE SECOND SPANISH ARMADA.

Smith's Current Intelligence for April 3, 1680, observes, "We have formerly given you an account account of the taking up of a great cannon in the Downs; since which we are very well assured, by letters from Deal, that, on the 25th of the last month, the fishermen of that town took up another copper gun of a prodigious weight and magnitude. It had several strange inscriptions upon it, together with the arms of the King of Spain, and those of Don Diego Messala, with his name in words at length under it, and the date of the year 1623; by which it appears to be one of the Spanish Admiral's guns, which was sunk when the Spanish Armada was defeated in the Downs by the Hollanders on the 21st of September 1639.

“The said fishermen also took up at the same time an oak of an extraordinary bigness, with all its roots branching out, which is supposed to have grown on the Goodwin before that Island was overflowed (which is several hundred years ago), and to have lain in the sea ever since; the outside of it is soft and spongy for several inches in, but the heart of it is very hard and sound.”

An octavo History of England, published by Bell, &c. 1722, gives the ensuing account of the destruction of the Spanish fleet in 1639.

“Not long after his departure (the Elector Palatine), the whole nation was strangely alarmed by the unexpected appearance of a Spanish fleet upon the English coasts, consisting of above seventy sail of considerable ships, commanded by Don

Don Antonio d'Oquendo. These were met by an inferior fleet of the Hollanders, who furiously assaulted them, and forced them into the Downs near Dover, where the Spaniards expected to be safe under the King of England's protection. There they continued for some time; when the weather growing stormy, Van Trump, the Dutch Admiral, told some English gentlemen, 'That, if they lay there a little longer, the King of England would have their guns, the country their wrecks, and the devil their men.'

"Both parties being allies to England, it was judged by the law of nations, that the shore and harbours of a neutral Prince should be a refuge to protect the weaker; but at last Van Trump, upon a slight pretence, without the ceremony of asking leave, fell in upon the Spaniards with that vigour and bravery, that he burnt, sunk, and drove ashore, far the greatest part of their formidable navy, in the very sight of our English fleet. This, though not justified upon the rules of honour, was yet highly pleasing to the common people, who hated the appearance of a Spanish Armada, and had too much reason to suspect their design; for, though they pretended only to carry recruits and money to Dunkirk, yet, such a design not requiring so many ships or men, the expedition seemed to have been meant for some greater purpose.

"By

“By some evidences since recovered, it appeared that the project was very much like that memorable one in Eighty-eight. And at the beginning of the following Parliament, a book was produced in the House of Commons, intituled, ‘The Papists fishing in troubled waters, whilst the King was at war with the Scots, with prayers in it for the Holy Martyrs that suffered in the fleet sent against the Heretics in England, anno 1639.’ However, this proved such a fatal blow to the maritime power of Spain, that they never since recovered it.”

DAEMONOLOGY.

The succeeding tales are introduced as proofs of the lamentable mental imbecillity of 1680.

“A young maid, who lived formerly at Kensington, but, removing from thence, lived in St. Martin’s le Grand, London, being about eighteen years of age, is fallen into fits of despair, saying while she lived at Kensington (being then about twelve years of age) she sold herself to the Devil for half a crown, and that the time is almost expired when the bargain must be performed.

“Several have been with her, giving her Christian counsel; but nothing will prevail with her, she raving like one distracted, acknowledging

herself to have led a very wicked life : that when she used to go to church with her Mistress, she went as if she had been loaded with some great burthen; and that the Devil used to prick her in the side, as if iron spikes had been run into her, so that she was not able to sit in the church, but was forced to go out, and fall to cursing and swearing, and then she could be at quiet.

“ Her Mistress says, she shewed always an unwillingness to any thing of piety : if she called upon her in the morning, or at night, to come up stairs to prayer in the family, she could not induce her to come ; and since the maid says, that the Devil used to meet her upon the stairs, and would not suffer her to go up. He generally appeared to her when she went about any thing that was good, as reading in the Bible, or any other good book, and would dehort her from it. Once he appeared to her about the middle of the night, and asked her if she wanted a light? to which she replied, that she had light enough when he was present.

“ On Tuesday last, some friends came to her in St. Martin's, and carried her to an aunt of her's, living at Putney; and the waterman that carried her thither said, that he was afraid the boat would have been lost in his passage thither, but could give no reason for it; and being told, when he landed, of the maid's distemper
(for

(for he was ignorant of it before), he said, had he known it, he would not have carried her for 100*l*.

“At Putney her aunt is very careful of her, procuring godly people to come daily to her to visit her, and give her spiritual comfort. One day they had her out to walk on Putney-heath; and, as she was walking, she of a sudden cried out, ‘Look there! look there! do you not see him? There he stands,’ pointing with her finger, and saying, ‘I must go, he is come for me.’ She being asked the reason why she sold herself, she said she saw other girls have fine things, and she had none, and therefore she sold herself. And being further questioned what she did with the half-crown which she sold herself for? she replied, she bought a pair of shoes with the money.” Banks’s Current Intelligence.

“From Edinburgh, of the 27th of last month (April 1680), we have the following account, that a certain woman there, supposed by her neighbours to have a familiar spirit, coming into the house of a certain citizen of that place, pretending to ask for one that was not there, the man of the house gave her some sharp language, and caused his servants to turn her out of door, which they did with some violence; but she had not been gone half an hour, but they found a strange alteration in their bodies, a numbness seizing on their limbs, accompanied with great pain, so that they were not able to help themselves. This accident increased the suspicion of the woman having a familiar, and was thereupon committed to prison." True Domestic Intelligence.

REMARKABLE EVENTS IN ITALY.

The month of March, 1680, was distinguished by several uncommon occurrences in the Ecclesiastical States of Italy. Lewis XIV. commanded his Ambassador at Rome to require the natives of Burgundy, resident in that city, to remove the Arms of Spain from the Church of St. Claudius, and to replace them with those of France. His mandate was obeyed, but a violent altercation between the Envoys of the two nations was the consequence.

A dreadful accident happened on the 24th, at Macerata, where forty-three Members of the Jesuits' College had assembled in their church to deliberate on the affairs of the brotherhood. At the very instant they were thus employed, the roof fell in, and killed and wounded twenty-seven of them.

On the same day, the son of the Marquis of Manilani lost his life by the overturning of his carriage; and the coach of the Duke of Newburgh's agent experienced a similar disaster, and fell into the Tyber.

On

On the 30th, the Pope distributed the annual gifts, or marriage-portions, to 440 poor young women, 38 of whom had 100 crowns each, six 200, and the remainder 50 each.

A HINT TO THOSE WHO ARE SOMETIMES INEBRIATED.

The author of "The True Protestant Domestic Intelligence" informs us, in his Paper of April 27, 1680, that, "Last week, a gentleman, having got drunk in Fleet-street, met with a cobbler and another person, and, in his extravagant humour, took them to a tavern, and spent about eight shillings upon them, where he fell asleep. They, observing him to have much money about him, agreed to make prize of him, and accordingly took from him, as is said, forty shillings in silver, three guineas, a watch, and a ring off his finger. The next day the cobbler was bragging with his guineas at a neighbour's house. But afterwards the person of the house, hearing of the gentleman's loss, suspected it might be the cobbler had done it: upon which a warrant was issued to apprehend him; but the cobbler, hearing of it, got out at the top of the house, where he stayed until he thought the coast clear, and then called to a neighbour to let him into their house, for the serjeants were waiting for him; but the person, understanding that it was the constable and not serjeants, serjeants, called the constable up, and then let him in to the cobbler, who apprehended him, and he was committed to Newgate."

A MONSTER!!!

Shakspeare is accused of creating an unnatural being to promote the catastrophe of one of his dramas. This accusation is of Gallic origin, and Frenchmen persist in it against every argument brought by Englishmen in favour of their excellent countryman. Much might be said to prove the justice of the objection; and we must admit that Shakspeare alone was capable of overstepping the modesty of nature, and of producing a genuine Monster, one who acts, and speaks, as if indeed endowed by a supernatural power. Let the abortive description of one fabricated at Paris be compared with the sturdy half-demon Caliban, and then decide whether any use could be made of the former in constructing such a play as The Tempest.

"Paris, May 7, 1680. At Barcelona they have taken up a prodigious Monster, having the face of a man. It hath upon its head a crown, and all the rest of the body was marked with several sorts of arms, as cannons, musquets, swords, pistols, halberds, standards, &c. with several devices about them. It had also a moon in the middle of its body, encompassed with several

several little moons. The picture of it is sent to his Majesty. The Astrologers prognosticate strange things from the taking up of this Monster."

We may exclaim with the seaman in the play just mentioned,

"How now, Moon-calf!"

BRITISH HUMANITY DISAPPOINTED OF REWARD.

England, situated in a tempestuous latitude, affords continual opportunities for the exercise of humanity on the whole line of its coast. The inhabitants of each of our maritime counties have at intervals contributed to save the perishing sailor; and their exertions, on some occasions, have been marked by astonishing effects and success. The late invention of the Life-boat will prevent many deaths through shipwreck, by preserving the intrepid volunteers who man her, though the honour of braving destruction to relieve the unfortunate is thus certainly lessened: but, who would wish to see the humane embarked in a frail boat, that they might obtain applause commensurate with their risk? An incident is related in Smith's "Current Intelligence," and afterwards rectified in "The Domestic Intelligence" for May 7, 1680, which does honour to the parties concerned, and must prove grateful to the feelings of the readers of this volume.

"Whereas

“Whereas there was an account from Weymouth, in Mr. Smith’s Current Intelligence, April 28, of twenty Frenchmen lately cast away upon the coast of Jersey (as it is declared there), which were clothed by the Governor thereof, Sir John Lainiere, and supplied with all things convenient for their return into France. These are to inform the World, that the thing is altogether a great mistake, it being about eight months since that misfortune happened; and that the said Sir John Lainiere was then in England, and not any ways instrumental either to saving the men from shipwreck, clothing them, or supplying them with any necessaries for their return. The person then resident, and commanding there, was Sir Herbert Langford, who used all his charitable endeavours (with the assistance of the Bailiff, and some of the better sort of the Island), not only to save the men, but clothe and supply them with money and conveniences for their return.

“The French King, being rightly informed of the accident by a messenger sent thither on purpose, sent his picture set with diamonds, valued at 1000*l.* sterling and upwards, designed as a reward for that particular service Sir Herbert Langford had then done; but the messenger retaining it three months and more within seven leagues of Jersey, after order was given for the speedy delivery thereof, the Governor, arriving two days before the messenger came into the Island, took the present as due to himself; and, having given the bearer a view of his Majesty's two Castles, returned within ten days after his arrival there, gratified with a horse of an inconsiderable value."

FRATERNAL DUEL, AND SUICIDE.

It is singular that many fatal duels have been fought by persons who had entertained a sincere friendship for each other previous to some silly dispute, which a few days reflection must have terminated by mutual forgiveness and explanation, had not the sword or the pistol been preferred to less injurious arbitrators. Shocking, indeed, are rencontres of this description; but they are innocent, compared to an inhuman affair which occurred at Paris in May 1680. Two brothers, who were joint inheritors of their father's property, quarrelled in dividing it, and became so furious in their dissention, that they had immediate recourse to their swords. Equally skilful and sanguinary, the points of each entered the breast of the other at the same instant: one died on the spot, and the other survived only two hours. Their mother, seized with sudden frenzy, flew to the top of her house, whence she precipitated herself into the street, and was dashed to pieces.

CELEBRATION OF THE KING'S BIRTH-DAY AT EDINBURGH, 1680.

As the antient form of doing honour to the natal day of the Monarch in the capital of Scotland differs essentially from the modern in the Metropolis of the United Kingdom, it is introduced from the London Gazette as worthy of notice.

“Edinburgh, May 29. This being his Majesty's birth-day, fifty old men, all in new blue gowns (to each of whom was given 50s.) went from the Abbey to the great Church, to assist at the public devotions: which being ended (our Dean having preached), the trained bands of the City drew up about the Cross, which was adorned with orange and lemon-trees, variety of flowers, &c. whither came the Lord Provost, Bailiffs, and Council, in their formalities, and having drank their Majesty's and their Royal Highness's healths, distributed the oranges and lemons, with variety of sweetmeats, among the people; the Cross running at the same time with claret at eight several conduits, and the great guns from the Castle being several times discharged, amidst the vollies of the trained bands, and the acclamations of the people, the night concluding with bon-fires, ringing of bells, &c.”

MRS. CELLIER AND THE GOVERNMENT.

From the first dawning of the liberty of the press, Printers might be mentioned who have endeavoured to render it disgusting to the real Patriot. The publications of those persons are generally marked by effrontery and unqualified assertion, rather than manly discussion tempered with firmness and sound argument. To expose the impudent railer at all Governors, and support the genuine patriotic Author and Printer, should be the favourite object of those who make politics their study. Mrs. Cellier was of the former class; and, as she deserves notice both as a female Champion of Liberty and an Authoress, we shall honour her with our exclusive preference by letting her speak for herself. After observing that she was cited before the Privy Council to answer for some of her works, where she boxed the ears of a Quaker, who was summoned as a witness against her; she addressed

“ A Postscript to the Impartial Readers.

“ On Monday, the 16th of this instant, the sheet F was taken in the press, and myself and the Printer brought by Messengers before Mr. Secretary Jenkins; and he caused us to give bonds and security to appear before the Lords of the Council, and in the mean time not to print any further.

“ On

“ On Wednesday, the 18th, I appeared before their Lordships, and testified the truth of what I had written, saying, I published it because I would come again before their Lordships; and did then accuse Sir William Waller, Mansel, Dangerfield, and their confederates, of High Treason, for endeavouring to raise a Rebellion, and for conspiring against the life of his Royal Highness; and proffered to make good my charge, by the testimony of persons of honour, persons of middle quality, and unspotted reputation, and by some of their own companions. And their Lordships were pleased to promise that we should be heard.

“ Thursday the 19th. According to their Lordships' order, I came to Mr. Gwin, the Clerk then in waiting, to give security for my good behaviour, and to appear at the King's-bench bar the first day of the next term; and, though several good house-keepers proffered themselves, he would accept of none but such as himself knew, which though it was very difficult for me to obtain, I was forced to do it. After security given, he would not let me depart till I had paid 3*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; and, though I told him that two Justices of the Peace expected me at that hour, to go with them to take the examination of a person that then lay sick, and desired him to let me go, and I would send the money to him as soon as I came home; yet he commanded

Otterbury

Otterbury the Messenger to take me into custody till I paid it ; and I was forced to stay till I sent home for money, and, by these delays, lost the opportunity of meeting the gentleman, and could not examine the party that day ; and the next he was taken speechless, as he still continues. By this means, I lost a most material witness ; yet doubt not but to make good my charge, if the rest may be heard.

“ I hope the readers have not forgotten, that, after it had been proved before the Lords of the Council, that Dangerfield stood in the Pillory at Salisbury ; yet, upon his single evidence, the Countess of Powis, the Earl of Castlemain, and other persons of considerable quality, were committed, and I was confined two and twenty weeks, and after that tried for my life June 11. But, though treasonable practices have been sworn against Dangerfield, by Justice Forster, Justice Hervey, Mr. Thomas Hill, and myself, yet the gentleman walks abroad undisturbed, and daily consults with his confederates how to act new villanies.

“ These things make me very sensible of the great difficulties and discouragements I am like to meet with ; but I hope the G— of truth and Justice will protect me, and bring me through them all, and pluck off the veils, and discover both truth and frauds bare-faced.

“ And

“ And whensoever his Majesty pleases to make it as safe and honourable to speak truth; as it is apparent it hath been gainful and meritorious to do the contrary, there will not want witnesses to testify the truth of more than I have written, and persons that are above being made The Hangman's hounds for weekly pensions, or any other considerations whatever.

“ And though I have been two and twenty weeks confined, and two and thirty weeks a prisoner, and my charge and losses much exceed a thousand pounds, I do not yet so much fear the smell of Newgate, as to be frightened for telling the truth; nor is death so great a terror to me, but that I am still ready to seal the same with my blood. Elizabeth Cellier.

We shall bid adieu to this spirited lady, who despised the “smell of Newgate,” by inserting a paragraph relating to her from the London Gazette of September 16.

“ September 13. This day Mrs. Cellier, who, we told you in our last, was convicted of having published a most scandalous libel, received her sentence, which was to stand on the pillory at three several places, the said libels being at the same time to be burnt in her sight by the common hangman; to pay a fine of one thousand pounds; to continue in prison till the same be paid; paid; and to give security for her good behaviour during her life."

DESCRIPTION OF A COMET SEEN IN 1680.

The comet of 1807 is fresh in the recollection of the public; but it was unfortunately so small, or so distant, that the Philosopher and Astronomer were equally disappointed in their intended observations and conjectures. The following letter, written in 1680, and published immediately after, is probably almost unknown, and will afford the reader an opportunity of comparing the knowledge of that period with the present on the subject of Comets.

"Meeting with a relation of the blazing Star, I find several particulars in it to be contrary to what it was here (at Derby), which some say cannot properly be called a blazing Star, because no star appeared to belong to it. Here, I will assure you, I, with many hundreds besides, upon the 10th, 11th, not 12th, nor 13th, nor 14th instant, saw it in this following manner.

"At its rising or appearance, which was after sun-set, and about over the place where the sun sets about March in the west, or west-by-south, it appeared from one of the small stars in the Via lactea, with a small short stream or brush, no longer than that in 1664. But, in about half an hour, it darted from the star to that prodigious length, that it seemed almost to reach

the medium Cœli at the cuffs (which came slanting down to the west from the northwards of the Heavens). It seemed not to be above two feet broad, and, at the nether end or basis of it, it was sharp as a dart, with the small star within the pile of the arrow (as I may term it); and about the middle of it, both as to height and breadth, was a very splendid star, which shone through the Comet's rays very gloriously, like other of the great Planets. About seven, the small basis star set, and after that the Comet appeared like an inverted pillar, the smaller end being still lowest.

“ It was after eight before the bright star set, the Comet still keeping its breadth at the upper end; and, when it quite took its leave, its rays were yet visible, darting them up into the firmament, as the sun doth when it sets, which make me and many others conclude, that when it went below our horizon, it did not disappear, but then began to appear to the westward. It is reported a Comet was seen hard by here in form of a wheel, of an extraordinary swift motion; but, because I did not see it, I will give no account of it; only at present subscribe myself your well-wisher and Protestant friend,

The various accounts of the situation and movements of the late Comet, which have appeared in the News-papers, are divested of every

absurd and imaginary embellishment, and bear the character of learned and attentive observation. How different the above, from a similar source! Mr. Rosell confounds Stars and the Comet together, and was so simple as to imagine the Comet darted at once to a prodigious length, when in truth the absence of the rays of the Sun alone performed the miracle. These remarks must, however, be understood to apply only to the general or public opinion of 1680. The Author of Nature had produced a Newton, who, at that very æra, employed his nights in eagerly watching this Comet, from which he obtained such results, as enabled him to predict the period of the return of those planets to as great a degree of certainty as their known eccentricity will permit.

Now we are on this once-supposed fearful subject, it may be worth while to shew how the Comet operated on the weak minds of some of the inhabitants of the Continent. Information from Wells in Austria, dated December 27, says, "Yesterday the Lord Philip Oswaldus, Baron of Othsenstein, and Mathematician to his Imperial Majesty, took an observation of the Comet, and found it to be in the 3 degrees 4 minutes of Aquary, with south latitude 1 degree 43 minutes. Its tail very long, extending to the Constellation of the Swan. It signifies, according to the opinion of our best Astrologers, scarcity of the fruits of the Earth, whence they conceive a famine may ensue, as also mighty wars, and great mortality. The French Astronomers, by letters from Paris of the same date, tell us, that it presages some grand war, or the death of a great Prince of Europe. At Hamburgh the Professor of the Mathematics, on the 3d of January, stilo novo, likewise observed it with a tube, through which the Star itself appears fierce and glowing like the fire in a baker's oven: the gleam or blaze 68 or 70 degrees in longitude, which, allowing 60 miles to each degree (as is usually computed on earth), make 4270 miles; but then, considering how much that measure is to be extended, in so high a situation in the Heavens, its length must needs be vastly more."

Terror created numerous Prophets and prophecies, but not one of the Soothsayers appear to have foreseen that the Comet would produce an egg; yet such was the fact: and now for my authority.

"Rome. We have many nights been surprized with the sight of that prodigious blazing phenomenon in the Heavens. But that which more amazes us, is, that since its appearance, a hen, in the house of Seignior Massimi de Campidoglio, in this city, laid an egg, in which there is very conspicuously seen the perfect figure of this Comet, the inward part of the egg being very clear, and the shell transparent. In the greater greater end is the Star, whence a blaze or luminous beam shines very bright to the other end. It was first taken notice of by a servant of the said Massimi, who, with wonder, shewed it to his master; and it hath since been carried to be viewed by the Pope, who, as wise and infallible as he is, knows not what to make of it. The Queen of Sweden, and most of the Grandees of Rome, have likewise beheld it with admiration, and have ordered it to be carefully repositied, where it administers not a little matter of speculation to our Philosophers *."

"The Loyal Protestant" gave further particulars of this wonderful story in the following words; to which the Editor added a sketch of the egg.

"Rome, March 6, 1681. There did appear here, about the middle of December last, a strange and a wonderful Comet near the Caliptick, in the sign of Libra, and in the body of the Virgin. At the same time a prodigious egg was laid by a young pullet (which had never laid before), with a perfect Comet in it, and as many Stars and in the same form as the inclosed figure shews. All the great ones of Rome have seen it, even the Queen and the Pope. What you see in the inclosed paper is within the egg most clearly expressed, and not upon the shell. The

* True Protestant Mercury.

Roman wits are now very busy guessing at what this Comet and Egg may portend!

“The true form of a prodigious Egg brought forth at Rome the 11th of December last, in the year 1680, in which the Comet here printed does continue to appear.

“The aforesaid 11th of December, about eight of the clock in the morning, a hen-chicken, with a great noise, crying extraordinarily, that never had laid an egg before this day, brought forth an egg of an extraordinary greatness, with all these several forms as you see here expressed, to the great amazement of all those that have seen it.

“This is an exact draught of the egg as it was printed in Italy; but all persons are left to their own choice, whether they will believe either this or any of our own late home-bred miracles or visions.”

TOM OF CHRIST-CHURCH, OXFORD.

This enormous bell is well known to the numerous Graduates of the University now scattered throughout the Country. Full oft has its deep-commanding note pervaded the recesses of relaxation and pleasure, and been the means of suddenly checking the vociferations of mirth, the operations of mischief, and ending the social converse of friends for the night. Tom is noticed in the True Domestic Intelligence of April 13, 1680, thus. “From Oxford we are informed, that, that, upon the 8th instant, the great bell, commonly called Tom of Christ-church, and which consists of 22,000 weight, after three fruitless trials before, at the expence of 800*l.* to the College, was at last cast with success. All the bells of the steeple immediately rung for joy at the birth of their elder brother.

“ The reason why this bell is of so great magnitude and weight, is, because, by the Statutes of the University, it is to call all scholars to their colleges, and town’s-people to their own dwelling-houses, at nine of clock every night; and Christ-church being at one end of the town upon a low ground, and not having the advantage of a rising situation, it was otherwise impossible it should serve for the ends or use it was designed for, unless the note of it was enlarged by the compass and weight of the bell.”

IMPROVEMENT IN MANNERS—VISCOUNT STAFFORD.

The second number of the True Protestant Mercury, sold by Langley Curtiss on Ludgate-hill, 1680, contains an article which forcibly demonstrates the low and inhuman violence of party prevailing at that confused and unsettled time. The editors of modern Newspapers dare not publish a similar recital of the execution of an Abershaw or a Despard at the peril of their sale; neither are they capable of such feeling as must have have prompted the writer of the brutal paragraph alluded to.

“ London. On the 29th of December, the grand Popish traitor, William Howard, laborer (for that we are told was all his title, or addition in the writ for his execution), late Viscount Stafford, was beheaded on Tower-hill. Concerning the manner of his suffering, an account having been already given in print, we need not enlarge (for we would not nauseate the reader this good time with cold pye). But this is certain, that the very speech which he read on the scaffold was printed, or at the press, a day or two before; which is evident, he suffering at nigh twelve o'clock. Within two hours, several reams thereof, in two sheet books, were published. And so little was the prisoner acquainted or affected with the same, that he could scarce read it himself, and made mistakes, &c.; and, by the character, it is believed, that the very paper he read was a woman's hand-writing. Besides, the prisoner appeared as one dozed with spirits or opium. And a small acquaintance with the Papists' principles and practices may sufficiently interpret both the contrivance and design of that prescribed oration, which he, poor man, was, no doubt, on pain of damnation (threatened by his Ghostly fathers), enjoined to repeat.”

True Protestant bluntness never appeared with more daring front than towards the commencement

ment of the reign of James II. That weak Prince might have read his fate, and that of his Religion in England, in almost every daily publication before he ascended the throne. He erred with his eyes open, and deserved no compassion. A paragraph from one of those publications will serve as a specimen of hundreds.

“Rome, December 28, 1680. On Christmas eve, the Pope and Cardinals assembled in the Chapel of Sixtus, at the Vatican, and mumbled over their Vespers, or Evening Prayers; then marched back to his Un-Holiness's own apartment, where Cardinal Cibo gave a collation to all those who would stay and assist at the Midnight Mass; which blasphemous idolatry was acted by Cardinal Ludovisio, and the Pope himself played the fool and the knave, as he is wont to do, in blessing and consecrating an hat and a sword, which are to be sent, forsooth, to Princes that will fight with Infidels and Hereticks.”

One of the miserable effects of bigotry, intolerance, and religious rage, proceeding from stimulants similar to the consecrated swords, was the murder of M. Clode, which is thus noticed in the publication whence this article originated.

“Brussels, January 14, 1681. The lady and children of the late Viscount Stafford (executed for treason in England), are daily expected here, and that they will take up their ordinary residence at Ghent. It is said the Jesuits have blown them them up to that height of vanity, that they refuse to wear any mourning for him, declaring publicly, that they ought not to do it, because he died a Martyr.

“ But let them thus gild over horrid treasons ; from Paris, by several letters, we hear of a deplorable Martyrdom indeed. The tragedy of the Rev. Clode, a most leàrned and laborious Protestant Minister, a man of extraordinary eloquence, and exemplary conversation ; who walking forth accidentally, before he was aware, met the Popish Host (or bredeu G—) carrying in procession, and having no way to avoid it, and not daring, out of conscience, to pay any worship unto that Idol, by uncovering his head, &c. the wicked rabble fell upon him with cudgels and stones, and beat out his brains. It is said, he formerly escaped the same danger very narrowly ; for meeting the Host, and the people beginning to take notice that he did not pay reverence to it, a Priest that had respect for his great parts, civilly plucked off his hat to him ; in return of which compliment, Monsieur de Clode plucked off his hat to him again : which the crowd imagining to be done in reference to their Idol, were for that time pacified.”

Methods were taken by the prosecutors of Viscount Stafford to counteract their jesuitical opponents both abroad and at home ; some of those were perfectly justifiable, others were despicable.

despicable. If the Jesuits taught the Roman Catholics to revere Stafford as a Martyr for their religion, the Protestants turned the Reverend fathers and his shade into ridicule in the following "Sober Dialogue betwixt William Howard, late Viscount Stafford, and the Lords in the Tower," which production certainly cannot be ranked in the justifiable class for obvious reasons.

"St. My Lords, I am come to visit you again; you may wonder I am come to you without my head. Be not affrighted, for the reason is plain: I spoke without my own head when I was alive, and now I am resolved to speak without my own head after I am dead.

"Ar. And how go affairs in those parts where you have been?

"St. By my No-head, not very well.

"Ar. How so?

"St. Why, when I came into Hell, I found there was a great reception prepared for me; and all the Popes and Cardinals that ever were in the world were drawn up in files for me to pass through.

"Pet. So, and what followed?

"St. Why, so I went forward, and passed through, and expected a great treatment by the preparations that I perceived at my apartment. So that I was considering whether my head were right set on or no; knowing that if that part of my windpipe above did not answer to that below,
the

the pleasure of tasting and swallowing would be very much inconvenienced. But to put me beside that curiosity, I had no sooner received the visits of about four or five of the most eminent Popes and Cardinals in those quarters, but I was sent for to appear before the grand Belzebub himself. Being come into his presence, the dusky Emperor demanded of me, What had brought me thither? I answered him, That I was brought thither by the commission of G—, as if I had been in a plot. In a plot, quoth the Devil! Against whom? Against my Prince, said I. With that the Devil presently asked me for security for my good behaviour. For, said he, plotters are the very worst of men; we will say that for ourselves, and a fig for ourselves, we that are Devils never plot one against another. Hell has a very bad opinion of plotters; and therefore, said he again, find me security for your good behaviour.

“Bel. And what did you then do, my Lord?

“St. Why, truly, my Lord, I was got pretty sober by that time, and thought to have sent for the five Jesuits; but then, thought I again, they are in Heaven, so that I was at a very great stand. And, to tell ye the truth, my Lords, had I known I should not have been in Heaven too, I should hardly have done what I did.

“Po. Why, my Lord, I believe you did come from Heaven, for you smell nothing of brimstone.

“St.

“ St. Look you now, you will persuade me out of my senses now, as ye did when I was alive; no, no, my Lords, I am not in Heaven, I am in Hell when I am at my new home; and I must tell ye, my Lords, I am not a little angry. With that they all turned colour, expecting some spiritual attack from the apparition: it being the common received opinion, that a man without flesh and bones is stronger than a man with flesh and bones, as we find by the strength of the wind, the force of which no corporeal substance is able to withstand. But the shadow protesting upon his honour, that he would not be guilty of any violence towards them, they resumed their wonted courage; and so the Spirit went on.

“ St. I say, my Lords, I am not a little angry that you should put me to read a made speech half-seas-over, more for your own ends than my advantage.

“ Po. Was it not as much for your advantage as ours?

“ St. No; for, had it not been for you, I could have played my game better, and I might have smoked many a pipe, and drank off many a glass more in yours, or else in as good or better company.

“ Po. Oh, Sir, you do not consider all this while, that the way of dying as you did, spared you the charges of an expensive funeral; and where could your body have been safer laid than close

close by the Communion table in the Tower Chapel?

“ St. I come not here to complain of the disposal of my body ; I am too late sensible, that it is too late to think of it : but I am come to complain of the breach of your assurances in reference to this part that here appears before you.

“ Ar. Sir, it is impossible but you must be secure in all that was promised you.

“ St. That is not so ; for I was promised the immediate possession of Heaven ; and I am quite in a contrary place.

“ Pet. How does your Lordship know that ? It seems you are no close prisoner yet.

“ St. That is nothing to the purpose ; I know it well enough. I did but ask for the Virgin Mary, and I had like to have had my brains beaten out.

“ Ar. Did you ask for the five Holy Jesuits ?

“ St. Yes ; and they told me they were there ; but I could not speak with them.

“ Ar. Then, I will warrant your Lordship, you mistake the place.

“ St. I tell ye I do not ; it is as dark as pitch ; and we only see as cats do, by a new operation of the sight.

“ Po. How came ye hither, then ?

“ St. Why, I claimed my privilege, as I was a Papist, telling the Grand Seignior of the Shades, that if Apparitions ceased, all the old women of our Religion would be converted from one of the chief articles of our Church. I thought I had done well, because you made me read that I was not ashamed of my Religion. But I find that the Devil has no great kindness for those of our Religion; and the reason is, because that whenever he has a mind to take a frolick in the world, and to possess either man or woman, we do so persecute him with our exorcisms, so beslabber him with our holy water, that he can never be quiet at his recreations. To tell you the plain truth, I had as lieve be hanged as to return thither again; for I have a deadly fear upon me of being called to another bar, and of receiving another sentence far worse than what I have received already. Where is that Lord and Priest that cajoled me with so many fine stories? Oh, here he comes. My Lord, what did you tell me, if I should confess?
that

“Cas. That you should be eternally d——d.

“St. What, if I should not confess?

“Cas. That you should be eternally happy.

“St. My Lord, I did not confess. You are a Priest and a person of honour; I expect you should make your words good.

“Ar. My Lord, we have done all that lay in our power; we have sent your Lordship's picture to Rome; we have petitioned for a Saintship for you you the next that falls; and therefore pray, my Lord, have patience a little while.

“St. All this will signify nothing, unless this good man, by his prayers, will speedily get me a Habeas Corpus to remove me into another place. I have pawned all my salvation to purchase this short liberty; how the Devil will value it I know not; but, if it should once chance to be attached and condemned in his Court, what a case shall I be in! Pray, good my Lord Priest, consider my condition.

“Cas. Why, Sir, did not you receive absolution for all the sins of your youth, and for all the sins of your old age, and for all the false protestations which you were ordered to own upon the scaffold?

“St. Yes.

“Cas. What need have you then to fear? Assure yourself, the Pope's power is above the Devil's; nay, I may say his power is so great in Heaven itself, that if we cannot get you out of the Devil's clutches by fair means, we will do it by foul.

“St. Look ye, father, you shall see that I will be reasonable: where is that place called Fools Paradise? Help me but thither, any where but where I am going to return. If there be any such place, I say help me thither, for I have been fooled out of my life egregiously.

“Cas.

“Cas. That could not be; you were only desired to withdraw for the general good of the cause.

“St. Why then, if it be so good a cause, pray will you make all the haste you can, and withdraw after me?

“Cas. I would be one of the first, I assure your Lordship; but that I stay for the good of your soul; and I assure you, in a short time, to make Hell too hot to hold ye.

“St. Truly, father, I find that I have been so infinitely deluded hitherto, that I know not what to say. I find, that if I had been but master of my own reason, I might have been master still of my own head; and therefore I must put ye a little closer to it. Is there no way in the world to avoid returning from whence I came? Have you never an old piece of Joseph's rusty axe? Never a little bit of the very cross? Never a rag of the Virgin's under-petticoat? These are things, they say, that will put the Devil into an agony, and make him condescend to any thing you would have him do. Or else, what think you of a little cruse of holy-water to carry with me to besprinkle the Devil should he come toward me with his toasting-iron?

“Cas. Renowned Ghost! be contented; thou hast highly merited of all the Saints that ever were and ever will be; and therefore the gates of Hell shall not prevail against thee.

“St.

“ St. Why this is something, indeed ; for here is a parcel of cold comfort, but I fear me not enough to mitigate one wamble of the great lake ; give me some more of it. Tell me how ye drew me in ; how ye deluded my devotion ; how ye cheated my conscience ; how ye bridled my confession ; how ye pampered my ignorance ; how ye charmed my reason and my senses ; how ye fooled me with promises ; and sent me to the scaffold to die like an oaf. All this cold comfort, put together, may serve me awhile to lay upon my tongue in the rich man’s condition.

“ As he was going on, the cocks began to crow ; which being the summons for nocturnal apparitions to depart, the criminal shade prepared to take his leave ; upon which, one of the company, observing the rule of drinking to the going person, began the Pope’s health, being now entered into another rule and method of living, only thanked him for his kindness, and so immediately vanished.”

ANOTHER SPECTRE.

Benjamin Harris, the retailer of many a wonder, says, January 28, 1680, “ From Leominster, in Herefordshire, they write, that, on the 20th past, a gentleman coming to lodge in a house in that place, and going to bed between one and two of the clock in the morning, he heard a great noise in the chamber where he laid, as if some doleful

doleful voice called; at which, somewhat affrighted, he starts up to see or hear what it might be that caused it; when, straight before his eyes, appeared the figure of a man, of dreadful countenance, with a dagger or knife in his breast, which so amazed the gentleman, that he knew not what to think; when as the spirit bid him not to fear, for he would not injure him; but, having been murdered in the house about twelve years since, he could not rest until the murder was made known: farther adding, that, in such a place in the cellar, his body lay buried; and thereupon vanished, leaving the gentleman in great confusion; but, notwithstanding, he took heart, and went to bed: from whence rising the next morning, he acquainted the master of the house with what he had seen and heard; who, upon discovery of the place, gave order to dig, where, about the depth of five feet, they found the bones of a man; but the people who lived formerly in the house being dead, they could not detect them for the murder."

It would be wrong to disturb the shade of Mr. Harris, by doubting and arguing against the perfect credibility of this well-contrived story.

ROSTOCK.

The inhabitants of England were recently favoured with the transient sight of a most splendid and beautiful Meteor; but those of Silesia were astonished and confounded in 1681 by the momentary view of a fiery bullet, which they described as follows, and in a manner full as ignorant and absurd as their English contemporaries ever demonstrated in the description of their own prodigies.

“ There have, of late, several prodigies been seen, not only in England, but divers other parts of the World, as particularly from Rostock in Silesia, the 17th past (December), we have this advice; that the Comet which hath been seen there hath much amazed them; but the most strange circumstance is, that a fiery bullet fell from the firmament. The same evening the Heavens in the East seemed to be ruffled up like a sheet of paper; at which time a white glittering bullet appeared, which seemed to yield several drops of water, and, as we could perceive, extended itself towards the North-east, and at last fell down at one of our gates; after which appeared two great flashes of lightning, but pale, and not so fiery as when it thunders. We asked the Centinel who stood at the gate, whether he saw the bullet fall or not? He said, he saw it pass towards a Village called Tetanet. From whence the Minister of the said place gives us advice, that he saw it pass by the Village towards the North-west; and those which live three or four miles from the said Village do inform us with

with one consent, that the said bullet shined clearer into their houses than the lights they burned."

A SPECIMEN OF THE RIDICULOUS.

"Lost, January 24, 1680, a black-flowered lutestring mantowe gown, betwixt six and nine at night, between the Savoy and York-garden and Long Acre. The marks being as followeth, viz. made of a gown skirt, the hind-breach-piece a crost fast bound with a six-penny ribon. Whoever hath found it, bring it to Helmet-court, over against Somerset-house, for Mr. Antrobus, and they shall have twenty shillings reward; and will much oblige the loser, because it will be a great damage to him if he have it not; or, if it be pawned or sold, he will willingly pay the charge *."

THE MAID OF HATFIELD.

This impudent Impostor, the agent of some Quack politicians, contrived to excite public attention and the horrors in the year 1688. Had she practised her stupid inventions under certain governments which might be named, her fate would have appeared plain enough to her view and contemplation without the aid of one of her familiars. The facetious Monarch, who was the object of the contrivance, treated Miss Freeman with a degree of coolness and contempt that did him honour, and completely disappointed her employers.

“ We have a relation of one Elizabeth Freeman, aged about twenty-one years, living at Bishops Hatfield, in the county of Hertford, taken before Sir Joseph Jorden, Knt. and Richard Lee, D. D. and Rector of Hatfield. The substance of the account which she gave is as followeth : That, on Monday night, being January the twenty-fourth, she sitting by her mother’s fire-side, between five and six o’clock in the evening, with a child in her lap, she heard a voice behind her, which mildly said, ‘ Sweetheart!’ Whereupon she, turning her face back, saw an appearance of a woman, as she conceived, all in white, covered with a white veil, so that she saw no face ; but a very white hand was laid on the back of her chair, and said to her, ‘ The fifteenth day of May it is appointed for the Royal blood to be poisoned ;’ and further said, ‘ Be not afraid, for I am sent to tell thee ;’ and so vanished.

“ On Tuesday, January twenty-fifth, about the hour of five or six at night, she, going to her mother’s house, coming near her door, the same apparition appeared to her again in white as before, and said, ‘ Do you remember what I said?’ And she answered, ‘ Yes.’ And she further said, ‘ In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Holy Ghost, What art thou?" And immediately it appeared in a very glorious shape; and, with a more harsh voice, said, 'Tell King Charles, from me, and bid him not remove his Parliament, and stand to his Council;' and said, 'Do as I bid you.' To which she answered, 'Yes;' and so it vanished.

"On January twenty-sixth, between the hours of five and six in the evening, she sitting by the fire, and her mother sitting by her, the same apparition came again to her, whereas she could not speak; and her mother, perceiving her to be troubled, and fixing her eyes, said, 'Daughter, seest thou any thing?' And she, not able to speak, nodded with her head and hand; whereat her mother said, 'Shall I go out?' And thereupon, she being enabled to speak, the apparition nodded to her; she said 'Yes;' whereat her mother going out, the apparition said, 'Do your message.' And she answered, 'I will, so soon as God shall enable me;' and it said, 'Be not afraid;' and so vanished.

"The apparition appeared to the maid on Thursday in the evening, between the hours of five and six, she being at a neighbour's house, but said nothing to her.

"This was taken from the maid's own mouth, by Mr. Richard Wilkinson, School-master in the town of Hatfield, and several others of the inhabitants.

"On

“On the ninth of February, the Hatfield maid, accompanied by Sir Joseph Jorden, Dr. Lee, and Mr. Wilkinson (who were, at taking her first examination in the country), and her mother, and several other friends, attended the King and Council; where his Majesty was pleased to ask her several questions, as also to hear her relation patiently; after which, he was pleased to bid her ‘Go home, and to serve God, and she should see no more such visions,’ or to that effect; and so she was dismissed.”

Another contemporary observes, most sapiently, “This business is variously censured, but must conclude it the transport of a melancholy imagination. There is likewise a noise of an earthquake near Uxbridge; but we are sparing to credit Visions and Prodigies.”

ANTIEN TENSE OF NATIONAL HONOUR.

“Brussels, January 28th. Yesterday here happened a great disturbance, caused by some French officers, who came hither (as they say) from Antwerp. They, being in a tavern, began to extol the greatness of their King, and to undervalue most of the neighbouring Princes, and more particularly the King of Spain, which so enraged some Spanish gentlemen present, that they challenged the French officers to the combat; the which being accepted, they being on both both sides about twelve in number, went down into a stone court, and with their swords engaged one another very smartly, so that, ere they could be parted (though upon the brink of the encounter some hundreds of people came), there was one of the French killed, and almost all the rest disarmed and wounded, but not without considerable mischief on the other side; which disorder has so incensed our Magistrates, that as many of the combatants as were taken were immediately committed to prison, there to remain till the Prince is made sensible of the matter."

INVASION!!

The British publick was amused and half terrified with one of the most impossible inventions for conveying a Gallic army to England during the last war that ever entered the imagination of man. A raft, hundreds of feet in length, and hundreds in breadth, armed with batteries of cannon, surmounted by castles, and covered with tens of thousands of soldiers, was to float or sail, or be rowed across the straits of Dover, and then —— but this is not the first contrivance for invasion. "Mercurius Bifrons," in his page of "Jocular Intelligence," says, "They write from Paris (in 1680) of a very

new and great project, of four grand Jesuits, who have undertaken to bring into England the French King's great army dry-shod, without the help of ships or boats: and, for this intent, all the wines and brandy, which lie upon their hands since prohibited by the English, are ordered to be brought to the sea-shore, and disposed all along from Brest to Calais; and all the paper likewise is brought down from Rouen, and a ream placed by each hogshead.

“Monsieur de Estrees is gone with his fleet to Brazil, to buy, or take by force, all their sugars; and, as soon as he returns, which is suddenly expected, the aforesaid projectors have promised to do wonders.”

The prohibition of French articles, and the destruction of them after importation and seizure by Government, was a measure adopted before the time above-mentioned. Surely the present Ruler of France must have perused the old Act of Parliament, which commanded this silly method of suppressing the manufactures of our antient Rival; at all events, he appears to have improved on the hint, by converting the produce of the sale of his confiscations of English commodities to the use of the State. It was excessive folly to destroy that which could not be sold by the Importer, and would have contributed to fill the Treasury.

On

On the 29th of February 1681, the Officers of the Custom-house, London, burnt

French linen, to the amount of 2000*l*.

Silks and lace - - 2000

And of hats - - 1000

Besides this wanton waste, several hundreds of hogsheads of French wines were staved in the same month. Such have been, and are, the frantic attempts of Nations to monopolize Commerce, a pursuit which never prospers so well as when completely free from all restraint.

RIVAL NEWSPAPERS.

The readers of our diurnal publications are frequently entertained and instructed, by the splenetic observations of Editors contending for superiority, in their real or pretended devotion to the leading politicians of the time passing. Those vary in their tone according to the temper of the writer, and are sometimes rather gross, often witty, and sometimes very stupid; but, let them take the following effusion issued by the Conductor of “The True Protestant Mercury,” March 16, 1681, and endeavour to improve upon it. The example is antient, and evinces the spirit of Editorship to be equal to any hazard.

“Whereas Thompson, in his lying Popish Intelligence, hath had the impudence to affirm, that that the passage in our Mercury of the ninth instant, touching Mr. Macnamara's endeavours to take Robert Pouer, a traitor, at the Queen's-head Tavern, was a fiction: and thereupon makes an outcry against Curtiss the publisher hereof, sillily prating of an action of 1000*l.* laid against him by Fitz Gerald, that keeps the said Tavern, and scandalously suggesting, as if the said Curtiss absconded for fear thereof: all which is utterly false. It is thought fit, by Mr. Macnamara, to acquaint the world, that, though he did not cause that relation to be printed, yet the same is certain truth, according as published in the said Mercury: and the constable is ready to depose, that Fitz Gerald the Vintner denied the said traitor Pouer to be in his house, but said he was gone an hour before, when Macnamara asked for him, though he was then above-stairs.

“ And no less true it is, that, when the said Vintner saw Macnamara too hard for his cousin Fitz Gerald, the pretended Captain, who drew his sword to rescue the traitor, he commanded his drawer to hold him, which he did so violently by the right hand, that the same is so strained, that he hath not, to this time, the use of it. And whereas Thompson vapours of that Vintner's being a Protestant, it is probable he may have taken the oaths, and go to church, as multitudes of them do; but it is notorious, that none of his family are Protestants, but for the most part Priests and Friars, and he himself is an harbourer of Papists and Priests; as, for example, of one Milo Pouer: and whereas he pretends not to know Robert Pouer the traitor, it shall be proved, by several persons, that he hath frequently resorted to his house, in company of other Papists, which is contrary to law, and his Majesty's proclamation, and against the principles of any true Protestant.

“Nor shall his cousin and he, and all the brood of them, be unaccountable for those pranks before the great Council; as also this brazen libeller, who, it seems, is set up on purpose to carry on and serve the turn of a Popish traitorous faction under the mask of a loyal Protestant; for this is he who printed part of Mrs. Cellier's libel; as also a lewd libel lately called The Ghost of the late Parliament, and divers other most venomous Popish pamphlets, and particularly that damnable blasphemous sheet called The Presbyterian Pater-noster, and is so notorious for such vile practices, that the late House of Commons, in their Address to his Majesty, of the 23d of December, did take particular notice of him.

“And what he now weekly vomits out is generally nothing but lies, scandals, and forgeries: he pretends letters from Ireland, when all the correspondence he keeps is more probable with the Priests and rogues in Newgate, as you may conclude by his ridiculous story of Bradely there, who, who, dreading the approach of a Parliament, and having a shrewd antipathy to hanging, would, it seems, be very willingly carried into Ireland, and get the witnesses against him and the Earl of Tyrone thither, where the hellish Tories might knock them on the head, or use them as barbarously as they did some of them already.

“But as to the scandal on Curtiss, as he laughs at their groundless bugbears, so he assures his friend Natt, that he shall quickly find the tables turned, and the thousand pound action will as certainly as deservedly fall on his own back.”

ROYAL STATE BED STOLEN.

“The Protestant Oxford Intelligence” of March 17, 1681, says, “On the 11th instant the Prince of Hanover’s lodging in Whitehall was broke open, and a bed with gold fringe, and richly embroidered, was stolen thence, valued at three thousand pounds; but, upon search, several parcels of the fringe, and other remarkable appurtenances, were found, and the persons, in whose custodies they were taken, carried before the Board of Green-cloth to be examined, in order to their commitment, who, as we hear, were sent to prison.”

This Prince of Hanover must have been William Prince of Orange, who came to England some time before, to espouse Mary, daughter of James Duke of York, and who afterwards made the

the following observations to Sir William Temple relating to Charles II. and his Ministers.

“ Was ever any thing so hot and so cold as this Court of yours? Will the King, who is so often at sea, never learn the word that I shall never forget since my last passage, when, in a great storm, the Captain was crying out to the man at the helm all night — Steady! steady! steady!”

A FEMALE NECK TOO TOUGH FOR THE EXECUTIONER'S AXE.

This wonderful lady, who baffled the art of beheading, is thus noticed in an article dated from Stockholm, “ March 5th, 1681. We are informed of a strange circumstance which happened some days since near this city. A woman, who, for being married to two or more husbands, was condemned to be beheaded; being prepared for death, and laying her head upon the block, the executioner gave the blow, but the axe rebounded like a tennis-ball; whereupon the condemned party rose up, and complained of injustice, and willed the executioner to desist, and alledged that she was free. Being re-conducted to prison, and visited, nothing appeared save only a small red stroke, and a little swelled, as we are informed by the Ministers of Justice of that place. The hatchet was sent for hither, and is as sharp as a razor; the swelling is now

The contriver of the above story would meet with encouragement, were he now living. His talents at a Hoax are indisputable.

RECEPTION OF CHARLES II. AT OXFORD, 1681.

"March 14. Upon notice given that the King was near Oxford, the Mayor, Aldermen, thirteen Bailiffs, Common Council, and others of the House, to the number of seventy, proceeded on horseback from the Guildhall to the East gate of the City, where, by that time, they had put themselves in order to march before his Majesty, his Majesty entered the gate. To him drew up the Mayor and Recorder (then newly alighted), both which kneeling by the coach-side, the said Recorder (or City-mouth) very smoothly spoke the following English speech to welcome their Majesties to the place.

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"I have read in the Roman history, that Marius was wont to say, that he that durst speak to Cæsar, was ignorant of his greatness : and he that durst not speak to him, was ignorant of his goodness. Of the latter whereof we, and all your people, have had so large experience, that I am emboldened to beg the stay of the wheels of your chariot for some few minutes ; and that I may find find so much favour in the sight of my Lord the King, as to speak a few words in the name of the Loyal Citizens of this place, which is but to let your Majesty understand the infinite joy and gladness wherewith their hearts are filled, in beholding the Royal presence of yourself and our most gracious Queen in this place. I say, to behold you, after so many wicked designs of bloody and unreasonable men against your Royal person, and the many and signal deliverances of you from them (for which the name of God be praised), here, at this time, in the heart of your Dominions, reigning in glory and safety, is a joy so unspeakable to all true English hearts, that if I had an hundred tongues I could not be able to express it.

“ And that you should, at this time, make this City the Royal Chamber and place of the reception of your Parliament, is a grace and favour ever by us to be recorded in the Register of time and fame.

“ And we hope that it may prove as auspicious to your Majesty for that purpose as any other place whatsoever, notwithstanding any surmises that have been made to the contrary, since there has been famous and good Parliaments held here, as might be proved by our antient records and histories, if there were time to do it. But, Great Sir, we must not presume to be too tedious in so great a presence, especially after your long and tedious tedious progress this day ; and therefore I shall presume to say little more ; but, for all the good you have done us, what can we render to you again ? Aristotle saith, we can never render equal things to God and our parents. You are the blessed Father of our Country ; and, under the shadow of your Royal protection, we do enjoy all our rights, both religious and civil, and confess that our obligations are greater than our acknowledgements can be ; yet, such as they are, we beseech your gracious acceptance of them. We have also one present more to make to your Majesty, which is our prayers devoted to your service ; and we prostrate all the ensigns of authority, which we hold under you, at your feet, and shall become daily votaries to Heaven, That our Gracious Sovereign Lord, King Charles the Second, may long and happily reign over us, and may always be a terror to his foes, and to all his good and loyal people a tower of defence ; and let all good people say, AMEN."

Which being concluded, the Mayor surrendered up the Gestamen of his authority ; which, being graciously returned (and thereupon a rich pair of gloves was delivered to his Majesty, and another to the Queen), he mounted ; and all the company being in order, the Constables (in number eighteen), went first, with their painted and gilt staves erected ; then the four Serjeants at Mace ; then sixty of the Common Council, and of the House,

House in black gowns; Bailiffs, and such that had been Bailiffs, thirteen; and Aldermen, to the number of about thirty, in scarlet; then the Recorder and his Deputy in black gowns; and, last of all, immediately before the King's coach, the Mayor, John Bowel, Esq. with his rich mace on his shoulder.

“After the King's coach, life-guard, and other coaches of his retinue, marched Mountague Lord Norris, Lord Lieutenant, with the loyal gentry of the County; and after him Sir Thomas Spencer, Baronet, at the head of one militia-troop, and Captain Henry Bertie, the Lord Lieutenant's brother, at the head of another. In this order they passed to Carfax the Market-place, and thence down the South Street to Christ church, where their Majesties intend to lodge during their abode in this city.

“But that which is most to be noted, is, that the way the King passed were such shoutings, acclamations, and ringing of bells, made by the loyal hearts and smart lads of the laity of Oxford, that to those at a distance it seemed thunder. The general cry was, Long live King Charles; and many, drawing up to the very coach-window, cried, Let the King live; and the Devil hang up all Round-heads; at which his Majesty smiled, and seemed well pleased, and melodious ringing of the ten stately bells there, the College sounded, and the buildings did learn from its scholars to echo forth his Majesty's welcome. Had you been here, you might have heard them ring again and again, Welcome, thrice welcome, Charles the Great. After nine at night were bonfires made in several streets, where were only wanting Rumps and Crop-ears to make the flames burn merrily; and at some were tables of refection erected by our bonny youths, who, being even mad with joy, made all that passed by carouse on their knees a health to their beloved Charles.

“ March 15. Between ten and eleven went from St. Mary's Church to the King's apartment in Christ Church, the Vergers, Yeomen, and Squire Beadles of the University, with their silver and silver-gilt staves erected; after them followed the Vice Chancellor, who is Deputy to the illustrious Prince James Duke of Ormond, Chancellor of this University; after him followed forty Doctors, in their scarlet habits (most of them in velvet caps), among whom was the Honourable Sir Lionel Jenkins, principal Secretary of State; after them came the Proctors, with their liveries behind them. All these, with some Masters of Art, being admitted into His Majesty's Presence-chamber, the public Orator welcomed him, in the name of the University, with a Latin speech; that done, he directed himself to the Queen, and, entertaining her with one in English, their Majesties were most graciously pleased to admit all the company to the kissing of their hands.

“March 17th. Early in the morning his Majesty left this place, and went to Burford, fourteen miles distant, at whose approach there, the Bailiff and other Members of the Borough met him, with their maces before them; and, after their congratulations, presented to him a very rich saddle; afterwards (taking a short repast in Sir John Lenthall’s house there) he went to the horse-race on the plain adjoining, where were beheld more nobility and gentry than ever were on Newmarket-heath. At night he went to Cornbury, to the house of the Earl of Clarendon, where he supped and lodged that night. Next day he returned to Oxford about four in the afternoon.”

The cause of this Royal visit to Oxford was the sitting of Parliament there *.

PRETENDED GHOSTS.

Of all the attempts at what is termed practical wit, that is most contemptible and injurious which trifles with the fears or superstition of weak persons; indeed, there are moments when people of great strength of mind and undoubted courage may be taken by surprize, and terrified into illness and perhaps the deprivation of some of their faculties. The assumption of a supernatural character has often proved fatal sport, sometimes to the witling who undertakes it. In a late instance, near Hammersmith, a person yet lives who must ever feel the deepest horror in reflecting that his folly produced the death of an innocent man, and the trial for his life of another. Let that dreadful fact, and the following, serve as warnings to prevent similar acts of insanity.

“A leather-dresser’s wife in Barnaby-street dying lately, an apprentice of the house one evening dressed himself in the usual apparel of his deceased Mistress; and, placing himself in a chair where she was wont to sit, waited the maid’s coming, intending only to make sport with her. But no sooner she entered the room, but she was so surprized and affrighted (conceiving it her Mistress’s Ghost), that she fell down dead for the present; and though recovered to life, remains as one distracted: but it is hoped, by advice of able Physicians, she may be restored to health.

“However, this ought to be a warning to unadvised youth, not to attempt such dangerous frolics, since they know not but the consequence may be irreparable*.”

* True Protestant Mercury, 1681.

THE DISAPPOINTED SUICIDE.

Langley Curtiss, who has furnished the Compiler of these Anecdotes with several materials, risked his credit by printing the paragraph which follows in his publication of March 23d, 1681.

“A remarkable accident happened lately in Salisbury Court in Fleet-street, which, out of respect to art, may not be unfit to be related. A person that formerly lived handsomely, being decayed, and consequently despairing, some time since, in a frosty evening, retiring into Sten-conduit fields near Islington, endeavouring to make away with himself, cut his throat, not only the outward part, but his very windpipe, and besides stabbed himself in three places of the belly, and lay wallowing in his blood all night, at least till the sharpness of the air, in some measure, closed the wounds, and then came home in the morning in a condition altogether desperate. But, by the skill of Mr. J. Mollins, a neighbouring surgeon, he is, beyond all expectation, perfectly cured.”

THE GRAND SEIGNIOR, HIS VIZIER, AND WINE LICENCES.

Mahomet forbade all good Mussulmen the use of Wine. His Alcoran is absolute on this point; but every Mahometan, like our English Counsellors, chooses to expound the law in his own way.

way. Charles Thompson, esq. says, in his Travels through Turkey, "So much has been already said concerning Mahomet's prohibiting the use of wine to his disciples, that little more need be added on that subject. We may observe, indeed, that many of them do not look upon it as absolutely forbidden; and even those who do, cannot help confessing it is an excellent liquor; and that the temptation is so inviting, that the sin of drinking is very excusable. When a Turk has tasted the least drop of wine, he thinks the crime will be no greater if he drink a gallon; and therefore, if they once begin, they swallow it down so plentifully, that they are usually intoxicated before they desist.

"No doubt but many Turks conscientiously abstain from wine all their life-time; but the generality, as far as I can observe or learn, make no great scruple of drinking it in private. It is reckoned a very heinous crime, however, to drink it during their great fast, or Ramezan; at which time, it is said, the person found transgressing used formerly to have melted lead poured down his throat. But I do not understand that this severity is exercised at present, though the offender never escapes punishment if discovered."

The above extract will explain the succeeding article, which appeared in March 1681.

"Advice from Sir John Finch, his Majesty's ambassador at Constantinople, confirms the late news, news, that the Vizier's Chiaw, or Substitute, was taken off; the manner thus. Some persons had made a complaint to the Grand Seignior, that, notwithstanding he had strictly forbid the vending of wine, being always forbidden to Turks by the Alcoran (though formerly allowed to be vended to Christians and Jews residing here), yet the Taverners had underhand, for fifty purses of money, procured a licence of the Vizier, or his Chiaw: on which the Grand Seignior sent for the Vizier, and taxed him with it; who, being conscious of his guilt, and seeing the Grand Seignior's displeasure, flung the same upon the Chiaw, and immediately dispatched the executioner to strike off his head, giving him money not to suffer him to speak for himself, lest he might declare his Master's guiltiness; and then presented it to the Grand Seignior, together with his estate, being of a mighty value, which he had extorted and amassed together in that station in the space of three years. And this advice is the more welcome, since the Chiaw was a great oppressor of the English nation, and another put in his place, who is a great favourer of them. Besides, his brother is made one of the five Viziers of the bench; and it is hoped that now the avene of 40,000*l.* laid against the English may be taken off, and a way opened for their future benefit."

THE PRINCE BORGHESE,

Who enjoyed the honours of his Ancestors contemporary with our Charles II. had a narrow escape from slavery in 1681. The Prince, his consort, and the Prince of Rossano, were on an aquatic excursion, when a Turkish shallop approached their galley disguised as a fishing-boat, and the crew as fishermen, under pretence of selling the produce of their labours. The Prince had the good fortune to suspect the deceit in time to effect his escape, through the superior sailing of his galley, and the exertion of the rowers; and afterwards found that two Caravals, from which the shallop was detached, were hovering in sight waiting for the success of the enterprize.

HORRID CONFESSION OF AN IRISH INNKEEPER.

The following shocking article appeared in most of the Newspapers of April 1681:

“From Dublin we have an account, that, at the last Sessions there, an Innkeeper being condemned for robbing on the highway, when he was at the gallows, confessed an horrid murder, complicated with most strange circumstances, which he had committed. The story take as followeth. Last Christmas, two persons, strangers to one another, came into his Inn, the one of them having a considerable charge of money. After they were in bed and asleep, he took the sword sword of the person who had the least money, and killed the other, and put the sword into his scabbard again all bloody. The person whose sword was made use of arose in the morning early, called for his horse, and prosecuted his journey. So soon as he was gone, the Innkeeper goeth into the room where the murdered person lay, and, with a seeming amazement, cried out, that one of his guests was murdered, and, upon search, found that his money was lost. Every one suspected the person who so lately rode forth; upon which he was pursued, overtaken, and, the Innkeeper drawing his sword, it was bloody, which was so strong a presumption of guilt, that, being tried for his life, he was found guilty. But, on the other side, the innocence of his countenance and behaviour when he was apprehended, and the extreme surprize he seemed to be possessed with at the sight of his bloody sword, and his not deviating from the right road to the place he over-night discoursed to be travelling unto, and the money lost not being found about him, the Judge had some scruple upon his mind, and obtained a reprieve for him; and, upon this confession of the Innkeeper, a full pardon."

FOOT-RACING

Has long been encouraged by our Nobility; as a proof of which take this instance. "Brussels, April

April 13, 1681. The Duke of Norfolk (Henry Howard, born 1628, and died 1683), and another person of honour, having agreed upon a foot-race to be run by an Englishman and another, from hence to Antwerp and back again: they set out at six in the morning. In their return, one of them fainted by the way; but the Englishman returned by four in the afternoon, being extremely tired and overstrained, so that he voided blood. The Duke and others gave him twenty-five rix-dollars."

PIRACY.

This dreadful mode of robbery prevailed to a very great extent about a century past; and consequently every Government in Europe coalesced in their endeavours to prevent the shocking murders which always occurred when part of the crew of a vessel took forcible possession, or professed Pirates boarded and captured Merchant-ships. The cruelties exercised on those occasions need not be repeated; but the gallantry of certain brave men who contributed to their extinction will be read with pleasure from that authentic source, the London Gazette.

"Jamaica, February 1, 1681. On Saturday last, our Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Henry Morgan, was informed that Jacob Everson (a most notorious Pirate) rid then in Cow-bay, with a Sloop and a Barqua Longa, and had a-board them them both about one hundred men; whereupon he presently ordered a Sloop, that was an excellent sailer, and very fit for the service, to be manned with fifty seamen and soldiers, besides officers, and, in less than an hour's time, got her to sail, having, upon the first notice, set sentinels to hinder any boats or men from going off to give the Pirates advice.

“Yesterday, about noon, our Sloop came before the Bay where the Pirate rid; and, as they stood in without any colours, and with most of their men in the hold, several of the Pirate's men that were ashore, came on board their Sloop and Bark. The Sloop being to windward, and most men appearing on board of her, they stood towards her, and, as soon as they were within shot, hoisted the King's colours, and laid them aboard. The Pirates fired first a few small arms, but did our men little damage; but, when they saw them enter with resolution and authority, many of the Pirates leaped into their canoes, which overset, and they were drowned; and, after some resistance, our men remained masters of the Pirate's Sloop.

“In the mean time, the Bark, riding somewhat to leeward, cut, and got under sail (though not without visible damage, three or four of their men, who were mending a top-sail which our shot had disordered, being seen to fall over-board); and our Sloop made all the haste possible, and chased chased her, but to no purpose (she sailing much better), and therefore returned hither, bringing in thirty-odd prisoners, some of which, it is believed, will die of their wounds. The Captain himself, who was on-board the Sloop (and being shot, was drowned), was a Dutchman, but all the men English, except six Spaniards, whom our Lieutenant-Governor will send to Carthagea by Captain Haywood, who will sail on Monday next. Our Governor has likewise issued his orders for the apprehending such of the Pirates as were left on shore."

ANOTHER STRATAGEM TO COUNTERACT THE PROGRESS OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIGION IN ENGLAND.

The Reader of the following Paper is entreated, by the Editor of this Work, to remember that no other motive induced its insertion than an intention to shew to the present population of England the disgrace and danger of Religious disputes, and the excessive lengths to which they lead unthinking persons. The utter impossibility of certain doctrines of the Roman Catholics are tenable grounds for argumentative resistance; but, for Heaven's sake, let no Modern imitate "The Popish Mass displayed: Or, the Superstitions and Fopperies of the Romish Church discovered: In which is shewed, the several antic jestures and profane prayers, used by the Popish

LIBERA NOS.

The art of rhyming was but little understood in the reign of the Stuarts; nor did the English language then possess that polish which it has since received from men of transcendant genius. This collection of scraps collected from various sources, and written about the time above-mentioned, furnish abundant proof of the truth of our observation. Nature alone is capable of making a genuine Poet; nor was she deficient in her operations during the reigns alluded to; but the public taste was vitiated by perusing the fatiguing declamations of party-writers, whose coarseness and vulgarity was extremely disgusting.

Milton and Dryden furnished models for imitation, which ought to have roused dormant talents into action; and yet many years passed away before Pope appeared and excelled his Master. Political and Religious disputes having subsided with the abdication of James II. the votaries of Literature and the Muses naturally turned their attention to the Belles Lettres and Poetry: improvement in each gradually followed; and it may safely be asserted, that hundreds of our present minor Poets would equal, if not excel, the succeeding lines which were written by one of the best living in 1681.

Party spirit inflames every line; but the Compiler begs he may not rouse a sleeping Lion in the the breast of an individual of his readers, by his supposing that the quotation is made to hurt his particular feelings or opinions. The object in view is solely to draw the attention to the state of common English poetry one hundred and thirty years past.

Democritus Ridens, a Paper published to counteract Heraclitus Ridens, must be noticed in its turn, to establish our pretensions to complete impartiality. The tenth number of the former contains a Ballad, as the Author thought proper to call it, which the Reader will please to accept as a further illustration of what has been said on this subject.

OUTRAGES IN IRELAND.

The unhappy state of the Sister Island is by no means a new subject of regret; and whatever may be the enormities (sanctioned or unsanctioned by Government) lately committed, they cannot exceed the following relation in horror.

"Dublin, April 17th, 1681. This day we have an account of the surprize and killing of the famous Northern Tory, Count Hanlan. The circumstances whereof, as I received them from the mouth of one of his confederates and executioner, and Mr. William Lucas, who was commissioned in that affair. That his Grace the Lord Lieutenant, finding all ways and endeavours hitherto used, as well by himself as other Chief Governors, for repressing and bringing to condign punishment outrageous Rebels and Tories infesting this Kingdom, resolved to act by his own sentiments and way, which was to this effect.

"His Grace sent for a person of honour of this City (acquainted in those Counties these Tories chiefly resort to), and commanded him to find

some person who might be capable of his Majesty's service in that affair. On which command Mr. William Lucas, of Drumyntian, in the County of Down, was sent for, who received the following commission, writ every word with his Grace's own hand, for privacy; none knowing of the design but this person of honour, and Mr. Lucas, whom his Grace acquainted with it; besides other private directions given Mr. Lucas; but the commission is as follows:

“Whereas William Lucas, gentleman, hath given me good reason to believe, that he is able to do his Majesty good service, in the apprehending, killing, and destroying, of proclaimed Rebels and Tories, if he may, upon occasion, have the help and assistance of such of his Majesty's Army as he shall desire: These are therefore to will and require all his Majesty's Officers, Civil and Military, to be aiding and assisting to the said William Lucas in the said service. And I particularly require all Officers of Horse and Foot, to send as many of the soldiers, under their respective commands, as he shall desire with him, and to direct such soldiers to obey his orders.

“And I further authorize the said William Lucas, in my name, to give assurance to any of the Tories, that, in case they shall assist him in the performance of the said service, that they shall have his Majesty's gracious pardon for any crimes crimes formerly committed by them, murder only excepted; and that, over and above, they shall be well rewarded.

ORMOND.”

“ Pursuant to which Commission, Mr. William Lucas, knowing of a fosterer of his out in rebellion with Redmond O’Hanlan, by one of his relations sent for him; and this Fosterer, one Arthur O’Hanlan, came to Mr. Lucas, who gave him a protection; whereby his Majesty’s Officers, Civil and Military, were ordered not to kill, apprehend, molest, or disturb the said Arthur during the space of one month. Arthur O’Hanlan, being thus furnished, encouraged, and provided with arms by Mr. Lucas, waited for a convenient opportunity of executing his design, which did thus offer itself.

“ On Monday the 25th instant, the said Arthur O’Hanlan and William O’Sheel, in company with Redmond O’Hanlan, were near the Eight Mile Bridge, in the County of Down, waiting for prize, on the score of a Fair that was held there; at which place, while they were watching for their prey, Redmond took some occasion to quarrel with Arthur, as they were smoking their pipes, and, in the close, bid him provide for himself, for he should not be any longer a Tory in any of the three Counties (viz. Monaghan, Down, Down, or Armagh) ; whereupon Arthur rose up and said, I am very glad of it, and will go just now ; and then, taking up his arms (having his authority and protection about him), immediately he shot Redmond in the left breast with his carabine, and forthwith ran to the Eight Mile Bridge for a guard. Arthur returned with a guard ; and Mr. Lucas, who soon had notice at the Newry, where he was waiting Redmond's motions for the same ends, found Redmond's body ; but the head was taken off by O'Sheel, who fled with it. The body they removed to the Newry, where it lies under a guard till orders shall be sent how it should be disposed of ; and since that, Mr. Lucas has sent out a protection and assurance to O'Sheel, to bring in the head of that Arch Traitor and Tory Redmond O'Hanlan.

“ This evening Arthur O'Hanlan gave in a relation of this adventure to the Lord Lieutenant and Council, who ordered him to have a sum of money paid forthwith for the good service he has done. And to Mr. Lucas his Grace has promised the honour of a command in the Army.”

A SHOWER OF GRAIN!!!

Those adventurous mortals who think proper to inhabit the bases of Volcanic Mountains are frequently indulged with varieties of showers. They have showers of ignited stones and lava of sulphureous sulphureous vapours, water, tufa, ashes, and sparks, &c. &c. But the happy Briton, remote from the freaks of those eternal fires, receives from his benignant skies, plumb-pudding stones, and grain. For instance:

“ By a letter from Mr. Thomas Dod, of Shrewsbury, we have an account that, upon the fourth of this instant May, there fell in the night-time a great shower, which, by the noise, was supposed to be hail; but in the morning there was found a considerable quantity of grain, like barley, of which the gentleman has reserved several handfuls. And yesterday a gentleman near St. James’s received several grains thereof, which was sent him in a letter from the said place.”

Those who wish to know more of the fall of plumb-pudding stones are referred to the recent volumes of the Gentleman’s Magazine. The above shower of Grain rests upon the authority of Mr. Langley Curtiss, who asserts it occurred in 1681.

THE UNFORTUNATE CHEMIST.

The Reader will please to accept this relation from “ The Loyal Protestant for May 14, 1681.” It will excite compassion, though the sufferer has very long ceased to feel sublunary calamities.

“ On Wednesday last, about six in the evening, a fire suddenly broke out in a chamber up three pair of stairs, in a Confectioner’s shop in Fetter-lane;

lane; but, by the industry of the neighbourhood, in a small time it was overcome, and only consumed part of the floor on which it kindled. The circumstance was as followeth: A French Chymist, lodging in the room where the fire began, having put fire in his furnace, after he had set it to work, went forth as he used to do about his occasions, and locked the door after him; but the brick-work not being strong enough, the fire took hold of the boards, and the door being locked, and the windows shut, it had taken considerable hold before it was discovered.

“The Chymist, when he returned home, and understood what a sad accident had happened, seemed much astonished; but, upon the cry of the neighbourhood (because he was a Frenchman) that it was done on purpose, he was apprehended and committed; and his landlord (being pressed to it) laid an action upon him, he having received above ten pounds damage in his goods, windows, &c. by the fire. But, upon second thoughts, his landlord, knowing him to be so far from being a Papist, that he was a rigid Calvinist, and being convinced of his innocency, would have discharged him; but the poor man, being in debt, and other actions brought against him, he remains in the Compter an object of pity.

“We the rather publish this, to prevent the belief of the report spread about town, as if this was

THE SWEET SINGERS OF ISRAEL.

Religion is acknowledged to have assumed as great a variety of forms as the celebrated Proteus. A modern author, sensible of this fact, has taken the trouble to sketch the history of every sect which has obtained celebrity in the United Kingdoms. Whether "The Sweet Singers of Israel" grace the list, and contribute to harmonise the heterogeneous catalogue, is unknown to the Editor of this Work; he will therefore venture to introduce these holy Musicians, who sung most melodiously themselves, and yet attempted to disturb the harmony of others.

Their Concerts had dis-concerted and ruffled the tempers of many well-disposed persons; their frantic actions induced the Police to interrupt their Religious orgies, which were considered quite repugnant to the mild and benign effusions of genuine devotion; and several "Sweet Singers" were committed to prison. The Author of "The Currant Intelligence" for May 14, 1681, introduces them thus to its Readers:

"Edinburgh, May 5th. As some of our Lords were returning yesterday from Council, attended by the Horse and Foot-guards, nine women (who call themselves the Sweet Singers of Israel), that are imprisoned here for their extravagancies, threw threw down stones out of the Prison-windows upon their coaches ; upon which an Officer ran to the Lords, and desired to know what should be done to them ; but their Lordships, looking upon them to be distracted, commanded him not to meddle with them, and so went on. However, the Officer went into the Prison, where he found them singing, and could not interrupt them till he had taken away their books. He highly threatened them for what they had done, and asked them how they dared abuse Authority after such an insolent manner ? to which they replied, that they did reverence lawful Authority ; but that they did not look upon those Lords to be so qualified ; and so went on with their singing.

“ The Privy Council met again in the afternoon, as they did also this Monday ; and made an order, that all the aforesaid women should be removed from that Prison to the House of Correction, where they are to be set to work, and fed only with bread and water ; and one of our Bailiffs is appointed to go twice a week to visit them, and see them receive twenty stripes a-piece each time. They are to be treated after this manner, till a conveniency can be found of transporting them either to Virginia or Barbadoes.”

The ensuing further particulars were afterwards published :

Edinburgh, June 7. “ Here is printed, by order of Council, a most blasphemous and treasonable sonable paper, emitted by the fanatical underscribers (who are Walter Ker, John Gibb, David Jamieson, and John Young), prisoners in Canon-gate Tolbooth Iron-house, in which they declare, 'That it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to them, to take out of their Bibles the Psalms in metre (being a human addition), and burn them in the Prison, and afterwards sweep away the ashes.' Likewise, in the Holy Scriptures, they renounce Chapters, Verses, and Contents, being only done by human wisdom. They renounce the impressions and translation of both the Old and New Testament, and that for additions put unto them by men, and other causes: as, first, putting in horrid blasphemy, making a Tyrant patron of the Church; for putting in horrid pictures; and for drawing scores betwixt the books of the Bible.

"They renounce all Catechisms, larger and shorter; the Acts of the General Assembly; all the Covenants acknowledging Sin, and engaging to duties; and that which they call Preaching-books; and all their works, form, manner of worship, doctrine, discipline, government, the studying of books, the thing they call preaching, by reason that, instead of going to God for his mind, they go to their books, making their books their God and their leader.

"They renounce the limiting the Lord's mind by glasses, ordination by men, the Covenant

taken at Queen's ferry, called Carghill's Covenant; as also the declarations of Hamilton and Sanghare, as not being strict enough; most blasphemously adding, that therefore it seems good to the Holy Ghost, and to them, to burn the said Covenants, together with all the former works of the Clergy of Scotland, and throughout the whole world, waiting till God shall give them teaching from himself.

“ They renounce the names of months, as January, &c. and of all days, as well the days of the week as Holy-days. They likewise renounce all Chapels, Chaplains, feasting, piping, dancing, laughing, Monk-land, Frier-lands, Churches, Church-yards, Market-crosses, Fountains, Images, all Registers of Lands and Houses, together with all manner of Law-works, Ballads, Romances, Play-books, Cards, and Dice.

“ They also renounce all the customs and fashions of this Generation, and their way of eating, drinking, cloathing, and sleeping. They renounce all that are in Prisons, as well men as women, by reason that, having sent a copy of this their declaration, they refused to receive it, calling them Devils.”

In the close, they most impudently say, that, after many days fasting and praying, they were pressed

pressed by the Holy Ghost to put out this Declaration; for which they afterwards made the amende honorable, and were pardoned.

CELEBRATION OF THE KING'S BIRTH-DAY AT EDINBURGH IN 1681.

The Anniversary of 1680 has been already described; but the celebration of the following year was infinitely more magnificent.

“ Sunday last, being the auspicious day of his Majesty's happy birth and miraculous Restoration, from all the Pulpits of this City were delivered very loyal and dutiful Sermons; but that of Mr. Cant, Principal of the College, was the most taken notice of (his father having been so eminently concerned in the late unhappy Covenant); in which he did clearly demonstrate, both from Scripture, and the doctrine of the Primitive Church, that Monarchy was jure divino, and that the true and lawful Successor in an hereditary Monarchy, such as ours is (being indeed the oldest Monarchy now in the known world), could not be excluded from the Crown, though he was a Pagan, or an Infidel, which, as he observed, even the Presbyterian Divines at Westminster could not but acknowledge it.

“ The solemnity which this City had prepared to celebrate this happy day was, at the desire of his Royal Highness, put off till Monday; which was then performed as followeth:

“ The

“The Lord Provost and Magistrates, having desired his Royal Highness to do this City the honour to come up to the Cross, or Market-place, to drink his Majesty's health, there was a large Theatre, forty feet square, all railed about, and covered with fine carpets, and hung with arras, upon which were four large tables filled with very large and high pyramids of all sorts of sweet-meats. The table where his Royal Highness sat was some steps higher than the rest, under an artificial grove of orange and lemon trees, loaden with their proper fruits, under which was one chair and cloth of state.

“The tables for the Nobility and Magistrates were also overshadowed with artificial groves. The Cross was decked all over with large trees filled with oranges and lemons, under the shadow of which was Bacchus bestriding a hogshead, very antickly dressed with garlands, and some other pageants; a number of trumpets, and the City Waits, in their liveries, playing all the while; the whole Trained-bands of the City, and the Militia Regiment, making in all thirty-six companies, in their best armour and apparel, were drawn up in the High-street, and made a lane from the Theatre to the Nether-bow port; at which place the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and whole Town Council, the City-honours, swords, and mace borne before them, attended by their trumpets, and rich liveries, where his Royal Highness

Highness alighted from his coach, attended by his Grace the Lord Chancellor, with a great confluence of the Nobility and Gentry, who, upon this occasion, were very rich in their apparel. His Royal Highness was guarded from the Palace to the Nether-bow by his Majesty's Regiment of Guards, commanded by the Earl of Linlithgow, and the Earl of Mar's Regiment, drawn up by the Earl of Dalhousie, their Lieutenant-Colonel, their Lordships, and all the Officers, being all in very rich laced coats, and his Majesty's Troops of Guards being all very fine in their new liveries, commanded by the Marquis of Montrose, with their trumpets and kettle-drums following his Royal Highness's coach from the Nether-bow to the Theatre. At the Cross, his Royal Highness alighted, and walked on foot to the Theatre; his Grace the Lord High Chancellor on his right hand, and the Lord Provost on his left; the rest of the Magistrates, attended by the trumpets, going before; the Nobility and Gentry following after, all uncovered.

“ Being come to the Theatre, his Royal Highness being sat at his table, the said Provost began his Majesty's health, which his Royal Highness and all the company pledged; then the Queen's; then their Royal Highnesses', and all the Royal Family's; the great guns from the Castle thundering off all the while; the noise of the drums, trumpets, kettle-drums, waits, could scarce be heard, being drowned in that more pleasing noise of the people, who ceased not, but reiterated their acclamations of ‘God save the King, Queen, their Highnesses, and all the Royal Family!’ The glasses and sweetmeats were all thrown among the people; the Cross all the while running wine in great abundance at eight several conduits.

“His Royal Highness returned to the Palace, attended after the same manner, extremely well pleased to see such a multitude of all sorts of people express so much loyalty, in so many cheerful circumstances, and so much affection and duty to himself; in whom they observed every day more of that exemplary justice, moderation, and gentleness, which has been always observable in the sacred race of our Kings.

“The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council, in their formalities, came down to the Palace-gate, where his Royal Highness was pleased to meet them, and to express his satisfaction at the solemnity of the day; and at the great bonfire, his Royal Highness drank his Majesty’s health upon his knees, and directed it to the Lord Provost and Council, who all upon their knees drank it, as did all the Nobility and Gentry present, with loud acclamations.

“The rest of the night was spent with bonfires, ringing of bells, shooting of great and small guns, and all other expressions of joy imaginable; not only the High-street, but the lanes of the City were all filled with bonfires.”

BURNING FOR ALLEGED WITCHCRAFT.

Hanging reputed Witches is an indelible stain on the character of a Nation; but burning them is a refinement of cruelty to which we are strangers, except by report.—“We hear,” observes the Editor of the True Protestant Mercury, in his number for June 8th, 1681, “that at a town called Drebesigne, belonging to the Turks, a woman, being condemned for a Witch, was lately burnt there; and her husband, being resolved to revenge her death, set fire to the middle of the town at noon-day, which immediately burnt with such fury, that near a thousand houses were in a short time destroyed, together with a great many people and cattle.” This man was apprehended, dreadfully tortured, and his body consumed, as a punishment for his horrible revenge.

CONFLAGRATIONS.

Langley Curtiss informed his readers, June 15, 1681, that, “by a letter from a very credible person at Kinley, in Herefordshire, he had an account, that a Mountain near that place, and not far from another place called Solomon’s Throne, hath burnt very vehemently for above a month. It is said that the other side of the mountain began to burn before Christmas; they see the flame by night, and the smoke makes great clouds by day, and is very offensive to those parts whither the wind carries it, having a very ill smell, as a gentleman riding over Mescod Common found by experience.

“There is another Mountain not far off, which hath likewise burnt for a great while; and, we hear, hath burned at least ten miles in length: people dare not adventure near, because they fear the ground is hollow. These mountains abound with much peat and heath; and it is thought some persons having set the heath on fire, and the peat and heath being exceeding dry (we having had no rain to cool the ground) hath been the occasion thereof.

“If any desire satisfaction of the truth hereof, let them enquire at the Jacob’s Well, behind St. Clement’s Church, without Temple-bar.”

The same industrious Editor added the following paragraph to his previous intelligence.

“By a gentleman lately come to London, who was an eye-witness thereof, we have an account, that the farthest part of Windsor Forest hath been on fire several days; and on Saturday last, when the gentleman came from thence, they told him there were above one thousand acres destroyed; and though the Country use all possible endeavours, they cannot quench it; and though they have digged trenches eight feet deep, yet it still goes on, and is now within three miles of Bagshot-heath, in Berkshire. The gentleman affirms, that great heaps of ashes lay all thereabouts. It is thought, that by reason of some quarrel among the

the neighbourhood about digging of turf, some malicious persons set it on fire, not imagining that it would proceed so far."

The badness of the roads, and other difficulties in travelling, rendered the communication between London and Windsor almost as limited as that between London and Hereford; hence it was in the power of artful persons, at the period when the above events are stated to have happened, to make mountains of molehills, and swell lakes into oceans, at their pleasure, and nearly to defy detection. Thanks to the good sense of the sons and grandsons of the then generation, chaises, mails, and stage-coaches, have since rendered the art of embellishing facts rather more difficult; and, instead of being alarmed, we laugh at the fears of our forefathers excited by such stories as the succeeding.

"Gloucester, June 18th, 1681.—We have an account of a strange and remarkable accident, which lately happened at the parish of Taynton, in the county of Gloucester; that one Edward Hook, a single man, of a drunken debauched life, who would often wish the devil to pluck out his eyes, if he did not this or that. This man, being lately at home alone in his house, was heard by the watchmen that passed by, to cry out, 'Let me alone!' and after some time, not seeing him come abroad, they broke up the door, where he was found dead, with his mouth wide open, and both his eyes plucked out, and nothing of them to be seen, neither was there the least string, nor a drop of blood to be observed. His brother was so astonished at the sight, that he fell sick, and died a week after.

“The truth hereof is attested by many honest considerable persons in and about Gloucester.

“It is credibly reported, that about a week since it did rain Wheat in the Forest of Dean, and several persons have some of the corns that fell.”

THE UNFORTUNATE ELEPHANT.

It might not be a subject altogether unworthy the notice of the Police of London to consider what would be the consequence of an accidental conflagration in or near Exeter Exchange. There can be but two methods of proceeding, if such a calamity should take place; either to suffer the wild animals kept there to remain in their cages and perish, or remove them under circumstances which most probably would let half of them loose upon the publick. Either of these alternatives are shocking in contemplation; but as we are willing to hope the proprietors take every possible precaution to preserve their premises from danger by fire, we shall now turn our attention to the poor Quadrupede whose miserable fate is recorded in the Currant Intelligence for July 2d, 1681.

“Dublin, June 18th.—On Friday morning, about three of the clock, a fire broke forth in the Elephant's

Elephant's booth, which, being made of deal boards, and those exceeding dry, it was burnt down, with the Elephant in it, and the Boy who usually rode on him, before any help could come to prevent it, though 1000*l*. (it is said) was offered for to save the Elephant. Had the roof of the booth been built of solid timber, so that it might have stood half an hour longer, it would have undone not only many private families, but all the King's records, books, and papers, would have been consumed; for it was built upon a waste plot of ground at the end of the Custom-house-lane, which faces Essex-street and the Council-house; the wind blowing hard at West-North-West, it beat the fire hard upon the Council-house, and fired the windows of the Council-chamber; but the building being of brick-work, and help coming in, they saved the house with all the records and furniture. There was but little other damage done, besides the burning of the Elephant and Boy.

"It is said that the fire began through the carelessness of the man that attended the Elephant, who by accident fired the straw where the Elephant lay. The flesh of the Elephant is taken off, and will be boiled for the fat of it; and the skeleton is preparing to be shewed."

STOCKHOLM INVOLVED IN SMOKE.

"Stockholm, July 1, 1681.—Yesterday this City was all involved in clouds of Smoke, which

at noon-day rendered the streets so dark, that people could not discern one another across the way : and what was the occasion of our extraordinary wonder ; but that no man could tell the cause of it, or from whence it came ; the people for the greatest part having no fires in their chimnies ; or if they had, as they had not, it is conjectured by many understanding persons, that ten thousand chimnies, smoking all at once, and the smoke driven downward, could not have caused the like ; so that every body conjectures, it happened by extraordinary means, and is the forerunner of some dire conflagration, or other approaching mischief."

The vast forests of Pines which extend over leagues of the Northern Kingdoms offers a solution for this apparent phenomenon : fires accidentally kindled amongst the combustible bodies of those useful trees sometimes cause extensive and dreadful devastation ; hence the smoke becomes very dense, and may be conveyed by a gentle gale to an incredible distance from the place where it originated. This was probably the cause of alarm to the good people of Stockholm ; or the smoke may have reached them from the craters of Iceland,

THE DUKE OF GRAFTON AND THE DEAL BOATMEN.

This was Henry Fitzroy, the second son of Charles II. by the Duchess of Cleveland. Active
and

and spirited, he, according to Collins, "addicted himself first to Maritime affairs, and having been in several naval expeditions with Sir John Bury, knight, Vice-Admiral of England," was created Baron of Sudbury, &c. &c.

In the year 1687, he was employed as a Vice-Admiral to attend with a squadron at one of the ports of Holland, there to receive on board the Queen of Portugal elect, for the purpose of conveying her to her new dominions, which he accomplished much to the satisfaction of the British Government. During the reign of his natural uncle James II., he commanded part of the King's forces employed against the Duke of Monmouth, and acquitted himself with equal address and courage. The Duke was employed in the siege of Cork; and leading a party to an assault on the 21st of September, 1690, he received a shot which broke two of his ribs. On the 9th of October following, he breathed his last.

The anecdote that caused the preceding slight notice of the leading particulars of Henry Fitzroy's life is derived from Smith's Current Intelligence for July 19, 1681, and will illustrate the hardihood and bravery which has at all times distinguished English seamen from the illegitimate Prince to the foremast-man.

On the 17th of July, two large vessels, one a Swede and the other a Dane, were unfortunately stranded on the Goodwin Sands. The boatmen men of Deal immediately went to their assistance, and, at the risk of their own lives, saved those of the crews, their chests, and some other trifling articles.

Previous to the time when the ships were totally beaten to pieces, curiosity induced the Duke to visit the wrecks, which he did in a small and frail boat, rowed by two men only. During this excursion they were subjected to all the violence of a sudden and unexpected storm. Persons unacquainted with the management of a boat, under similar circumstances, must have perished; but the triumvirate were undismayed: the two men and the Duke, equally calm and collected, rowed with the utmost skill against each other; and, however surprising the fact, they succeeded in keeping the boat from being swamped, and arrived greatly fatigued, but in perfect safety, at Ramsgate.

CURIOUS ELECTIONEERING MANOEUVRE, 1681.

The observation of a contemporary, after relating the following particulars, is so extremely just, that the Editor has nothing to add to the weight of it. "Counterfeiters of money, or Highway robbers, not more deserve the gallows than such who, by forging members that are to be intrusted to so great a degree with our liberties and estates, endeavour as much as in them lies to destroy the happily constituted government of the nation."

An

An action was brought at Kingston, during the Surrey Assizes of 1681, by Denzil Onsloe, Esq. against the Bailiff of the Borough of Haslemere, for a double or false return of a Member of Parliament for that Borough. At the election alluded to, Mr. Onsloe had thirteen suffrages; Sir William Moor eleven; Mr. Gresham eight; and a fourth candidate seven. According to these decided majorities, Onsloe and Moor were declared duly elected.

The antient constitution and custom of the Borough required that the electors should be not only scot and lot men, but freeholders. Now, as all those had voted, it remained for Mr. Gresham to determine whether he would retire a disappointed candidate, or, by a deep-laid scheme, create new freeholders, and through their assistance renew the contest, with the certainty of obtaining a triumph over his competitors. Six freeholders was the number deemed necessary for this honourable purpose: four of these were reared from a cabbage garden, by the proprietor of that useful piece of ground conveying such portions of it to the parties concerned as amounted to the value required; the transfer of some rooms and a cart hovel to the remaining two completed the artifice, which the Bailiff concluded by a new return.

The examination of witnesses on this occasion proved, that similar practices had prevailed before; which which exciting the indignation of the Lord Chief Justice, he inveighed severely against such infringements on the constitution. The Jury, feeling his Lordship's sentiments to be strictly correct, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with 50*l.* damages and costs of suit. At the same time, a gentleman was ordered to find sureties to answer an information to be brought against him.

THE DUKE D'ELBEUF AND MR. SAVILE.

The latter gentleman was Envoy from the British Court to that of Lewis XIV. At some period previous to 1681, the domestics of each party had quarrelled; but not having brought their contention to an issue, the servants of the Duke waited a favourable opportunity to make an attack upon their enemies. This occurred immediately on the arrival of Mr. Savile at Paris from Fontainbleau, when the riotous fraternity assembled in such force, that Mr. Savile's men prudently closed the gate and shutters. Unfortunately one of the number happened to be from home, and returning at the moment, he entered into an expostulation with the offenders, and endeavoured to prevail on them to relinquish their guilty purposes.

This rational advice procured the poor fellow who gave it a severe beating; which exasperating the men within the house, they seized their rapiers, threw open the gates, and assaulted the rioters rioters with irresistible ardour; four were killed, several wounded, and others fled.

The Duke d'Elbeuf waited on Mr. Savile, to offer every reparation in his power; the latter, however, thought proper to give information to the Lieutenant of the Police; after which, he demanded and received an audience of the King, who, having heard the Envoy's statement, expressed his regret in handsome terms; at the same time giving orders for the arrest of the servants, and the banishment of the Duke to his government in Picardy during pleasure.

THE AMBASSADORS OF THE KING OF BANTAM.

The various methods contrived to entertain and amuse Ambassadors of the above description would form a curious collection. In the year 1682, two, with most appalling names, sent by the Monarch already mentioned to the Court of England, were invited to visit and inspect the King's Printing-house, then situated in Blackfriars. Two of the Royal state carriages conveyed the Ambassadors, the son of Sir Charles Cottrell, and Mr. Maidstow their interpreter, and two other coaches the retinue of the Envoys. After inspecting every object of interest with considerable attention, they were assisted in composing and printing their own titles, which are given for the benefit of posterity—"His Excellency Keay Nabee Naia-wi-praia, principal Ambassador from Sultan Sultan Abdulcahar Abulnazar King of (Surosoan, formerly called) Bantam; to His Majesty of Great Britain, &c. ; in the year 1682."

SPECIMEN OF ORTHOGRAPHY, 1682.

This is selected from No. 162 of the True Protestant Mercury.—"Lost, a Flowered silk Manto (Mantua) Gown of a sable and Gold Coulor, lined with Black, betwixt Arniseed Clere (St. Agnes le Clair) and the White Houses at Hogsdan (Hoxton) on Wednesday last, the 19th instant, about 4 or 5 a clock in the Afternoon. Any one that can give Intelligence of the said Manto Gown to Mr. Blewit's, at the Rose and Crown in Loathberry, shall have 10s. for their pains."

DREADFUL TORRENT OF WATER IN SICILY, 1682.

Mountainous countries have numerous attractions to invite visitors; but the inhabitants frequently pay most severely for the contemplation of their elevated rocks, deep-wooded ravines, and beautiful descents of water. There must have been something awful and sublime in the appearance of the district described as destroyed in the following extract from the London Gazette, dated Palermo, June 25, 1682, before the event related. What pen or what pencil could communicate a

just picture of the horrid scene presented after the fatal torrent had exhausted its fury !

“ We have an account from the town of Tor-torica, that on the 6th instant, about seven o'clock in the evening, after so great a darkness that no object could be distinguished at the distance of four paces, there arose a great storm of rain, lightning, and thunder, which lasted thirty-six hours; that about one o'clock the next morning, great torrents of water, caused by these rains, fell from the neighbouring mountains, with so great rapidity that they carried with them trees of an extraordinary bigness, which threw down the walls and houses of the town they happened to beat against.

“ The waters were so violent, that they overthrew the Church of St. Nicholas, and the Archdeacon of the town who retired thither perished there, with many other persons ; there only remained one Abbey, and about 50 houses, and those so shattered that they fell one after another. There were about 600 of the inhabitants drowned ; the rest, being abroad in the field gathering their silk, fled to the mountains, where they suffered very much for want of provisions.

“ The goods, trees, stones, sand, and other rubbish, which the waters carried away, were in so great abundance, that they made a bank above the water two miles in length, near the mouth of the river, where before the sea was very deep.

This

This town is situate in that part of Sicily called the valley of Demona, on the side of the river Tortorica, about 25 miles from the Tuscan sea. The towns of Randazze, Francaville, and several others, have likewise been destroyed by this great flood. It is added, that Mount Ætna casts out such abundance of water, that all the neighbouring country is drowned."

EFFECTS OF TEMPERANCE.

Sir Henry Blunt died in Hertfordshire, some time in the year 1682, at the very great age of 90. It is related of this gentleman, that he transferred his estate, with the inheritance, producing between four and five hundred pounds per annum, to Sir John Harper of Derbyshire, on condition that he should receive an annuity of 1000*l.* for life. The temptation on the part of the latter appears to have arisen from the character of Blunt, who was ardently fond of travelling, and not less so of the bottle, two propensities which promised a speedy and profitable termination of the annual payment. Blunt, sensible of the advantage he had gained, determined to lead a new life, and became one of the most temperate of men, and actually received 40,000*l.* for his inheritance. "This," says Langley Curtiss, in his Mercury, "may serve for advice to all debauchers, to become sober and temperate, if it were only to preserve their lives."

BRAVERY AND PATRIOTISM OF BRITISH SEAMEN
IN 1688.

The castle at Gosport was situated on low ground directly facing Portsmouth, which it commanded with twenty cannon. The Irish soldiers who were in England at that period acted with great violence in favour of the court, and roused the terrors of the country by the most cruel threats of rapine and bloodshed. Several sailors, who had observed the turbulence of the Irish, determined to obtain possession of the Castle, which they accomplished by stratagem. Loitering near the gates, they proposed a drinking-party to those within their view: the offer was accepted; and, entering, they very soon beat the garrison out.

The Duke of Berwick, being informed of this strange and unexpected occurrence, sent a messenger to demand the evacuation of the place. Far from complying, the sailors returned a spirited answer, declaring they would surrender the Castle to any Protestant commander the Duke would appoint, but to no other. These brave sons of Neptune were relieved from the difficulties of their situation by the Revolution which took place in December.

WILLIAM III. AND THE ESTATES OF SCOTLAND.

The Revolution alluded to in the preceding anecdote having placed William III. on the throne of England, the estates of Scotland adopted immediate measures to secure to their own country the advantages of the new government; and, for that purpose, sent a deputation to London, whose proceedings with the King at Whitehall are related in the article below, composing the second number of a work on the affairs of Scotland, published in the form of a newspaper, May 24th, 1689.

“The Earl of Argyle, Sir James Montgomery of Skelmorly, and Sir John Dalrymple of Staire, the commissioners sent by post by the meeting of the Estates of Scotland to offer their Majesties the Crown of that kingdom, about three of the clock, met at the Council-chamber, and from thence were conducted by Sir Charles Cottrell, master of the ceremonies, attended by most of the nobility and gentry of that kingdom, who reside in and about this place, to the Banqueting-house, where the King and Queen came, attended by many persons of quality; the sword being carried before them by the lord Cardross (and their Majesties being placed on the Throne under a rich canopy), they acquitted themselves in their commission as follows.

“The Earl of Argyle (before the presenting of the letter from the meeting of the Estates of Scotland to the King) spoke thus:

‘May it please your Majesty,

‘It cannot be unknown in how sad and deplorable able a condition the kingdom of Scotland was, not many months ago; the liberty and property of the subject quite destroyed, either upon pretence of law, without any ground, or by such laws as were designed and calculated for enslaving us; our religion exposed, and laid open to be ruined by the treachery of our clergy, as well as by the compliance of our rulers. And so far had this Popish and arbitrary design run on, that we were very nigh past hopes of a recovery, when it pleased God to raise up your Majesty to be the glorious instrument of retrieving our religion, liberty, and property, from the very brink of ruin.

‘It is from the grateful and dutiful sense of so happy and unexpected a delivery, as well as from the respect due to the blood of their ancient Monarchs, that the Estates of Scotland have commisionate us to make a humble tender to your Majesty, and your Royal Consort, of that crown and kingdom, with the firm persuasion and assurance of this rooted in their hearts, that the care and protection of religion, liberty, and property, could be nowhere so well lodged as in the hands of your Majesties, their great and glorious deliverer.’

“Then his Lordship presented to his Majesty the following letter; which, being delivered back, was read by Mr. Eliote, the secretary to the commission.

‘ A letter from the Estates of Scotland to the King.

‘ May it please your Majesty,

‘ The settling of the monarchy and ancient government of the kingdom admitting no delay, we did, upon the eleventh instant, proclaim your Majesty and your Royal Consort King and Queen of Scotland, with so much unanimity, that of the whole House there was not one contrary vote. We have nominated the Earl of Argyle, Sir James Montgomery of Skelmorly, and Sir John Dalrymple, younger, of Stair, in our name, to attend your Majesties with the cheerful offer of the Crown; and humbly to present the petition, or claim of right, of the subjects of the kingdom. As also to represent some things found grievous to this nation, which we humbly entreat your Majesty to re-mead by wholesome laws in the first Parliament. And in testimony of your Majesty’s and the Queen’s acceptance, we beseech your Majesties, in presence of these sent by us, to swear and sign the oath herewith presented, which our law hath appointed to be taken by our Kings and Queens at the entry to their government, till such time as the great affair allow this kingdom the happiness of your presence in order to the coronation of your Majesties.

‘ We are most sensible of your Majesty’s kindness and fatherly care to both your kingdoms, in promoting their union, which, we hope, hath been reserved to be accomplished by you ; that as both kingdoms are united in one head and sovereign, so they may become one body politick, one nation to be represented in one Parliament. And to testify our readiness to comply with your Majesty in that matter, we have nominated commissioners to treat the terms of one entire and perpetual union betwixt the two kingdoms, with reservation to us of our church-government, as it shall be established at the time of the Union. These commissioners do wait your Majesty's approbation and call, that they meet and treat with the commissioners to be appointed for England, at what time and place your Majesty shall appoint. And if any difficulty shall arise in the treaty, we do upon our part refer the determination thereof to your Majesty. And we do assure ourselves, from your Majesty's prudence and goodness, of a happy conclusion to that important affair, so as the same may be agreed to, and ratified by your Majesty in the first Parliament. We do likewise render your Majesty our most dutiful thanks for your gracious letter brought to us by the Lord Ross (a person well affected to your service) ; and for your princely care in sending down these troops, which may in the meantime help to preserve us ; and, when the season offers, may be employed towards the recovery of Ireland from that deplorable condition, and extreme danger, to which the Protestants there are exposed.

exposed. The guarding our coasts with a good fleet preserves England as well as us from any invasion.

‘ And as it is the interest of England to contribute to secure us from the first impressions of the common danger, so we shall not be wanting on our parts to give our assistance for reducing of Ireland, that all your Majesty’s kingdoms may flourish in peace and truth, under the auspicious influence of your happy reigns.

‘ Signed at the desire of the Estates, and in our name, by our President.

‘ May it please your Majesty,

‘ Your Majesty’s most humble,

‘ most obedient,

‘ and faithful subject and servant.

‘ HAMILTON, P.

‘ Edinburgh, April 24, 1689.’

“ Then Mr. Eliote proceeded to read the Claim of Right, after it had been presented to his Majesty by the Earl of Argyle, and delivered back by the King.

“ In the third place was read a paper of grievances, which the Estates desired might be redressed.

“ Then followed the reading of the following address.

‘ An Address to his Majesty.

‘ May it please your Majesty,

‘ It is the humble desire of your Estates of Scotland, that, for the further settling and securing ing of the Protestant religion, the government, laws, and liberties, of this kingdom, and redressing the grievances represented by them, your Majesty will be pleased to turn this their meeting into a Parliament.

‘ Signed at the desire of the Estates, and in our name, by our President.

‘ May it please your Majesty,

‘ Your Majesty’s most humble,

‘ most obedient,

‘ and faithful subject and servant,

‘ HAMILTON, P.

“ After these papers were read, his Majesty was pleased to express himself to this purpose :

‘ That at his coming from Holland he had a particular regard to Scotland, and had emitted a declaration for that kingdom, as well as for England, which he would make effectual to them ; that he did take it very kindly Scotland had expressed so much confidence in him, and should testify his sense of it in every thing that might be for its interest, and would be ready to redress all grievances, and prevent the like for the future by good and wholesome laws.’

“ In the last place, the coronation-oath was rendered to their Majesties ; which my Lord Argyle pronounced distinctly word by word, and their Majesties repeated it after him, holding up their right hands, according to the custom of taking oaths in Scotland.

‘ THE OATH.

‘ We, William and Mary, King and Queen of Scotland, faithfully promise and swear, by this our solemn oath, in presence of the eternal God, that, during the whole course of our life, we will serve the same eternal God, to the uttermost of our power, according as he has required in his most holy word, revealed and contained in the New and Old Testament; and according to the same word shall maintain the true religion of Christ Jesus, the preaching of his holy word, and the due and right ministration of the sacraments, now received and preached within the realm of Scotland; and shall abolish and gainstand all false religion contrary to the same, and shall rule the people committed to our charge, according to the will and command of God, revealed in his afore-said word, and according to the loveable laws and constitutions received in this realm, no ways repugnant to the said word of the eternal God, and shall procure, to the utmost of our power, to the Kirk of God, and whole Christian people, true and perfect peace in all time coming. That we shall preserve and keep inviolated, the rights and rents, with all just privileges of the Crown of Scotland, neither shall we transfer nor alienate the same. That we shall forbid and repress in all estates and degrees, reif, oppression, and all kind of wrong. And we shall command and procure, that justice and equity in all judgments be kepted to to all persons without exception, as the Lord and Father of all mercies shall be merciful to us. And we shall be careful to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, that shall be convicted by the true Kirk of God of the foresaid crimes, out of our lands and empire of Scotland. And we faithfully affirm the things above written by our solemn oath.

“ Under ‘ April the 24th, 1689.

‘ This is the oath to be presented to their Majesties the King and Queen, appointed by the Estates to be marked by me as their President.

‘ HAMILTON, P.’

“ The meeting of the Estates of Scotland had authorised their Commissioners to represent to his Majesty, in relation to the last clause of the oath, about the rooting out of hereticks, that, by the law of Scotland, no man can be destroyed or persecuted for his private opinion; and that even obstinate hereticks, convicted for perverting of others, can only be denounced or outlawed; whereby their moveable goods are confiscated. Accordingly they did represent the same to the King; and his Majesty, when he took the oath, at pronouncing of the last clause, did say publicly, ‘ I do not mean by these words, to be under any necessity to become a persecutor;’ and did require the Commissioners, as witnesses, that he had signified so much in taking the oath; to which the Commissioners answered, that persecution was neither

neither intended by the oath, nor required by the law of the land.

“ God save King William and Queen Mary.”

VISIT OF WILLIAM III. TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE, 1689.

The following interesting article is extracted from the London Gazette, October 10, 1689.

“ On Sunday last, the Vice-Chancellor, the Heads of Colleges, and Doctors in all Faculties, with several Regents and Non-regents, in their proper habits, waited upon his Majesty at Newmarket, being introduced into his Royal presence by his Grace the Duke of Somerset, Chancellor of the University. The Reverend Dr. Covell, Vice-Chancellor, addressed himself to his Majesty in a proper and elegant speech, congratulating the glorious successes his Majesty had been blessed with in his endeavours to rescue this church and nation from the imminent dangers that threatened both, and which were more particularly pointed against the Universities. And concluded with an humble recommendation of themselves to his Majesty's protection, wherein the Protestant religion had so much concern. To which his Majesty was pleased to return in answer, that as God had blessed him in this undertaking, so he should faithfully discharge his trust in preserving the church of England, land, and giving all protection and favour to the Universities. They then waited upon his Majesty to church, and at their return from thence were conducted to the King's house, where, by directions from his Majesty, they were received and splendidly entertained at dinner by Sir James Forbes, clerk of the green cloth.

“The next day, his Majesty was pleased to make a visit to the University, and arrived here in the morning, being met without the town by the Mayor and Aldermen of the Corporation in their formalities, who complimented his Majesty, by Mr. Pepys, their present Mayor, and made a present of a large basin and ewer. They marched before him into town, at the entrance whereof his Majesty was received by rows of scholars, according to their several degrees, on each side of the streets leading to the public schools, and amidst the loud acclamations of all sorts of persons. His Majesty, alighting at the schools, received there the public thanks of the University, by the Vice-Chancellor and their orator, for the great honour that was then done them; and an extraordinary Commencement being then held on this signal occasion, for conferring degrees on persons of worth in all faculties, Mr. Kidder and Mr. Pelling were created Doctors in his Majesty's presence, being presented by the Regius Professor, Dr. Beaumont, with that unimitable elegance which is so peculiar to him.

“From

“ From the schools his Majesty walked to King’s College, where Mr. Layton, a fellow of that society, declaring in his speech the apprehensions they were under least they might have offended his Majesty by a late petition, wherein they only mentioned one single person as duly qualified to succeed in the vacancy of their Provost, and humbly beseeching his Majesty’s favourable construction of that matter, his Majesty was pleased (that none might be left there doubtful of his favour) graciously to assure them, that he willingly granted all they desired, or could wish, and that they might admit Dr. Roderick to be their Provost as soon as they pleased, which they received with the greatest joy and gratitude imaginable.

“ After that, his Majesty went to Trinity-College ; and in the first court thereof was congratulated by the Honourable Dr. Montague, the master, and in the second by Mr. Norris, a fellow of that College, and with a copy of English verses in the new-built library ; the structure whereof his Majesty was very well pleased with. And here his Majesty was pleased to accept of a dinner, provided by the University, in the College-hall ; where, at the upper end, was a table, raised five steps above the floor, at which sat his Majesty, and at one end his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, who attended him hither ; and at the other tables, on each side of the hall, were their their Excellencies the Spanish and Dutch Ambassadors, with several other Foreign Ministers, together with the nobility and principal gentry in great numbers. All which his Majesty was graciously pleased to accept, sending from table a message to his Grace the Chancellor, that he drank to him, and wished prosperity to the University of Cambridge. Immediately after dinner, his Majesty returned to Newmarket through infinite throngs of people, who crowded from all parts to have the happiness of seeing his Majesty."

SIEGE OF VIENNA IN 1683*.

The capital of Austria having a second time fallen into the power of the French, within a very short period, after resistance which hardly deserves the name, it may be proper to compare the successful defence of the above date with the well-known facts attending the recent surrender. The narrative now given was compiled from the account published by the British government immediately on the receipt of it from the Austrian court.

The Turks, having assembled in great force, made an irruption into Hungary, compelling the Duke of Lorrain, who commanded the Austrian army, to repass the Raab, retire under the walls of Altenburgh, and separate his infantry and cavalry by sending the latter to the island of Schutz, in the Danube. At this critical moment, the Duke received the melancholy intelligence, that the Hungarians, on whom he depended for the protection of the Raab, had betrayed their trust. A rapid retreat of the Imperialists was so promptly pursued by the Turks, that the van and rear of the two armies were warmly engaged, when the Prince of Savoy was mortally wounded.

The Duke arrived in the neighbourhood of Vienna on the 8th of July; and at nine o'clock the same evening their Imperial Majesties and family departed for Lintz. This event produced ungovernable dismay throughout the city; numbers fled in every direction; but the governor, Prince Stahremberg, having entered the town on the 8th, with the assistance of Count de Capheres, made every possible effort to improve the defences, and particularly by planting pallisadoes on the counterscarp. On the 11th and following day, six regiments of Imperial infantry entered; when the garrison, including 1500 men of the regiment of Stahremberg, consisted of 14,500 foot, and 1000 horse, exclusive of from 12 to 15,000 citizens, capable of bearing arms.

The 13th of July was appropriated to the horrid task of destroying the suburbs, composed of more than five thousand houses and sixteen palaces; the whole of which, with their valuable contents, were reduced to ashes. On the succeeding day, eleven regiments of cavalry, seven of dragoons, three of Croats, and sixteen troops of Polish horse, marched through the city, and crossed

crossed the Danube, on their route to Corne Neubourg. Four large boats, laden with ammunition, reached the town the same day; with which the Turks contrived to introduce incendiaries, who succeeded in burning several houses near the principal magazine; but, being discovered, the populace seized them, and they were literally flayed alive, and thus dragged along the streets.

During this dread interval of preparation, the enemy advanced into Austria; the Tartars, composing part of their number, committing the most shocking acts of barbarous atrocity. On the 15th, Vienna was formally invested by 150,000 men. The Grand Vizier took possession of the Empress Dowager's palace, called *La Favorite, and made it his head-quarters; he ordered the trenches to be opened immediately, and some guns were fired at the town before the close of the day. On the 16th, they opened three batteries, and discharged many bombs; and the Turks obtained possession of Leopoldstadt, and another small island in the night. Amongst the casualties of this day was a wound received by the Prince-governor, who was contused in the head by a stone forced out of its place by a cannon-ball.

From the above date till the 19th, they advanced their works; and sallies were made by the besieged under a very heavy discharge of cannon on both sides. The 20th, a battery opened from Leopoldstadt, composed of artillery and mortars. The next day, Prince Stahremberg received a letter from the Duke of Lorrain, with promises of relief. The day of the 23d, the fire of the Turks evidently decreased; but the succeeding night explained the cause, by the explosion of two mines sprung on the sides of their principal line of attack, which was directed against the Lebl bastion. Three several assaults immediately took place on two points; those were repulsed with great effect, and numbers of the enemy perished.

The 25th produced a repetition of explosions and attacks, with no better success on the part of the besiegers, except that the Germans suffered severely in the loss of men; this the latter attempted to balance by springing a mine under the Turks on the 26th, which failed in a great degree of the conjectured effect.

A letter, written by the Governor to the Duke of Lorrain, had been intercepted. This was tied to an arrow, and shot into the town, with a summons to surrender, before the Grand Seignior became completely exasperated. The counterscarp was again assailed, and desperately defended, on the 27th, four several times; and from that date till the 3d of August, mines and countermines were constantly exploded, and the assaults were almost uninterrupted. At 10 at night of the 3d, the besiegers stormed the counterscarp before the ravelin of Burgshor, and made a lodgement, after four repulses. The same day they completed a battery facing the Burg bastion. The 6th, they fired several mines, and descended into the ditch, to the great alarm of the garrison. A sortie took place the next day, when many Turks were slain. This they revenged on the 9th, by a mine which buried numbers of Germans; but their friends, making another sally, ruined the works raised in the ditch, though with considerable loss of lives.

Mines continued to be sprung by both parties: on the 11th, 12th, and 13th, the Turks erected new batteries; and, in the face of much opposition, again established themselves in the ditch. On the 14th, the garrison saw them advance their works in it before the ravelin; and the night following they were lodged on the point of the latter. These works were once more demolished by the besieged; and, after continual fighting, the Turks again succeeded in securing the ditch, when the former made several retrenchments within the bastions.

The loss of officers began to be severely felt, exclusive of many sick; one colonel, five lieutenant-colonels, thirty captains, and thirty-eight lieutenants had perished, with privates in proportion. The point of the bastion of Lebl was blown up on the 2d of September; which was followed by an attack, and a repulse. A second mine made a breach in the flank of the above bastion; but the endeavours made by the Turks to enter were rendered abortive by the spirit of the garrison.

The distress now experienced induced the Governor to make signals from the tower of St. Nicholas, explaining his situation; and this circumstance, perhaps, induced the furious and unsuccessful efforts of the Turks, on the 5th, 6th, and 7th, to gain the injured bastion. The 8th proved a fortunate day for the town, as the engineers had discovered a very large mine, and withdrew the powder: the same day they repeated the signals of distress.

The 9th of September was distinguished by the breaking up of part of the Turkish army, which marched towards Kalemberg. This unexpected movement was explained by a prisoner, who said, that they had received advice of the approach of the Christian army; the remainder, however, continued the siege, by mining and bombardment. On the afternoon of the 11th, the whole body moved in the direction above-mentioned: still the operations continued, and the fire from the batteries was almost incessant; and thus the Turks proceeded till the approach of a brigade of Imperialists, under the command of the Margrave of Baden, threw them into confusion, which the Governor perceiving, ordered an attack upon their trenches, where the Turks perished, nearly to a man. At five, the Margrave entered Vienna, when when he found the garrison reduced to 4,500 men—a force totally inadequate to the further defence of the bastion where the breach had been made.

An attentive examination of the works raised by the enemy filled the spectators with astonishment, as they found the trenches, not only secure from the effect of shot, but equally secured from the beams of the sun, and the beating of the tempest. This invasion of the Turks was attended by the following disastrous consequences: the siege of the capital for sixty days; the misery of the inhabitants; the loss of 100,000 Christian lives; besides great numbers carried into captivity; and the complete desolation of Austria.

Two letters, written by the Governor, and inserted in our national Gazette, are so honourable to the memory of that brave officer, and, at the same time, so illustrative of the above narrative, that they are given without hesitation.

“A letter from the Count de Stahremburg, governor of Vienna, to the Duke of Lorrain, dated August 18th, 1683.

“God be thanked, one of my letters has had the good fortune to come to your Highness's hands. You would have received many more since the 22d past, had I found persons fit to carry them, in which many have miscarried; and it will not be my fault if your Highness be not oftener and better informed for the future.

That your Highness may at present know our condition, I will tell you, that hitherto we have disputed every foot of ground with the enemy, and what they have gained they have paid dear for, having, as often as they attempted to lodge themselves, been very vigorously repulsed by us with our swords in our hands, with so great loss on their side, that they now hardly dare shew themselves out of the holes and hills with which they have surrounded their attack of the counterscarp. Your Highness understood by my last, that the enemy had made a descent into the ditch of the ravelin, and that they blew up part of the wall; where, as they did then, so have several times since, made an assault; but, God be thanked, without success. We have likewise several times beaten them from the post they had taken at the foot of the breach; but, as soon as our men retired, they returned thither again. I have thereupon used what precaution I could, and have caused pits to be made in the point of the ravelin, and done whatever else might most annoy the enemy. I have done the like in the bastions they attack, where they have as yet gained no ground, remaining still on the edge of the counterscarp. The 14th, they made a descent into the ditch before the bastion, called Lebl; and the same night they made another great lodgment in the ditch; whereupon, perceiving that we could not much incommode them there, neither with our great or small shot, because they lay too low in the ground, I employed our cannon against their works that secured their passage into the ditch, and, attacking them three several times, we beat them from thence. In the first attack our men were not strong enough to ruin their works; but in the second, towards evening, we ruined part of their works; and in the third, which we made in the night, we destroyed all their works, and the wind being favourable, burnt their gabions, and almost all their gallery; and since that they have not made any farther attack upon the ravelin on that side. Yesterday they sprang a mine, but without any success. We have made in the middle of the ravelin a good retrenchment with a good ditch. The bastions of Lebl and that of the Court have likewise double retrenchments; and I am now making a great retrenchment behind these two bastions, so that your Highness may see we are not wanting in any thing on our part; and, I assure you, I will never surrender the place but with the last drop of my blood. For the rest, our men do not fear the enemy; and, thanks be to God, thirty and forty of ours have always beaten and dislodged one hundred of theirs. This day was brought to me a Janissary prisoner, who, among other things, tells me, that they have lost in the attacks they have made 11,000 men, a great many officers and Janissaries, and the Bassas of Mesopotamia and Albania; and that they begin to suffer very much for want of forage and victuals, which they are forced to go a great way for, and that they are expecting a convoy from Macedon. For what concerns myself, I have had the bloody flux these eight days; but am at present somewhat better: however, that made me not neglect my duty, for I was carried where I could not go. Your Highness will comfort us with your presence, and do me the favour to believe that I am, &c.

in

of

“ P. S. August 19. Since yesterday, the enemy have again sprung a mine under the ravelin, and given an assault with 11,000 men, whom we received very well with our great and small shot; and in conclusion they made an inconsiderable lodgement, though with the loss of 300 of their men; but this morning I sprung a mine, which dislodged them, and buried a great number of them. I expect at this minute a like entertainment from them; and if I can be ready before them, I will spring one more to your Highness's health.”

“ A copy of a letter from the Count de Stahrenburg, Governor of Vienna, to the Duke of Lorrain, dated August 27, 1683.

“ I cast myself at your Highness's feet, most humbly to thank your Highness for the goodness you were pleased to express towards me in your last letter. Your Highness knows I am perfectly devoted to you, and that I desire nothing more

passionately than by my most humble services to render myself worthy thereof. Since my last, the enemy have sprung six or seven mines in the ravelin, which, after having repulsed them, we presently repaired again, and we still maintain our retrenchments, the enemy having hitherto gained no more than a lodgment on the point of the ravelin. We search above and under ground, and have countermined three of the enemy's mines, and sprung two mines, which had good effect, and would have had better, were our miners more brave and expert; but, being people which we get together any way, it is impossible to make them re-enter a mine when they once hear the enemy at work. In the counterscarp, the enemy have likewise sprung three mines near a retrenchment, palisadoed, which we still maintain, to cover the caponiers we have in the ditch; and though the palisadoes were in some places beaten down by the last mine, yet our men maintained the post with their swords in their hands, till such time as they were made good again, and we do still keep it. The enemy have again made two descents into the ditch, the one towards the bastion of Lebl, and the other towards that of the Court; from whence our men did in open day, under the favour of the fire we gave upon the enemy two hours together, very bravely dislodge them, while others, commanded for that purpose, filled up their works, and burnt their gabions and galleries, galleries, so that they now must begin again. But, Sir, it is time to succour us: we lose a great many men, and many officers, more by the bloody flux than by the fire of the enemy; for there dies almost every day sixty of this distemper. We have no more grenadoes, which was our best defence; our cannon are partly spoiled by the enemy, and partly burst, not having endured fifty shot, by reason of the badness of their metal. And the enemy, finding they cannot with small numbers lodge themselves in the ditch, make great lodgments on the counterscarp, to keep a great number of men there, and to make an extraordinary effort. For the rest, it is certain, that the enemy have lost, and do still lose, every day a great many Janissaries, and that they have many wounded and sick of the same distemper, which reigns amongst them. They have several camps far enough from each other, and may be easily beaten if they stay for your Highness here, which I do not believe they will do. They are not at present 60,000 fighting men, and one camp may be beaten before it can be assisted by the other. We expect your Highness with the greatest impatience; but I, not so much to be delivered of this siege, as to have the honour to assure your Highness of the respect with which I am, &c.

“P. S. At this instant my miners inform me, that they hear the enemy working beneath them under the bastion of the Court; they must have passed passed the ditch under ground, and there is no more time to be lost."

"An account of the solemnity observed at the proclaiming our dread Sovereign King James II. in the city of Madras, on the coast of Coromandel, in the East Indies, the 13th day of August 1685, by order of the East India Company, as followeth.

"The whole Council, with the commanders of ships, and the rest of the Company's servants, and English gentlemen, inhabitants of the city, came to attend the President at the Garden-house, with a handsome equipage on horseback; after that came Paddi Naigue with his peons, and the chief merchants, with a great number of inhabitants of the Gentue town, all in arms, bringing with them elephants, kettle-drums, and all the country musick; and from thence we set forward with this numerous company of people through the Gentue town, the houses and streets being adorned all the way. Paddi Naigue's peons, the chief merchants, and Gentue inhabitants, went first, elephants carrying our flags, the kettle-drums and musick playing before them; after that went twelve English trumpets with silk banners, and six hoeboys, all in red coats, playing by turns all the way, and Mr. Coventry, clerk of our court, on horseback, bareheaded, and, with his sword drawn, carried the proclamation in his hand open; then then the president, &c. and the rest of the English gentlemen, went in due order. The troop was commanded and led by the president, Mr. Thomas Lucas, cornet, and the rear was brought up by Mr. Elihu Yale; and when we came to enter the garrison at the Coultrey-gate (one of the chief entrances into the city), there was in readiness three complete companies of soldiers, and all the principal Portugueses, to receive the President and Council, &c. who marched before them to the Fort-gate, Sea-gate, and back to the Choul-trey-gate (three of the principal places of the city), at all which places the Proclamation was read by Mr. Coventry, all persons being uncovered, and their swords drawn, and the Proclamation ended with great shouts and joyful acclamations, crying, "God bless King James II." Also, at every place of reading there was a volley of small shot, the trumpets sounding, and hoe-boys playing; which done, the President, &c. returned in the same order to the Garden-house, the great guns both of the fort and town firing all the time; and after that all the European and country ships did the like; and soon after the President, &c. were returned, the Persian and Syam Ambassadors with great state, and a numerous retinue, came to congratulate our solemnity, and to bring their good wishes for his Majesty's prosperous reign, who, after some small stay, being handsomely saluted and treated according to to their quality, with a banquet, musick, and dancing, they took leave, and departed to their houses with great satisfaction ; and then a general invitation being made, we drank his Majesty's health, and long and happy reign, and at night there were bonfires and fireworks, wherewith this solemnity ended."

DREADFUL STORM IN HOLLAND.

No country is more unfortunately situated, when violent agitation subsists in the atmosphere, than Holland ; where the inhabitants are not only exposed to the usual effects of wind and rain, but experience the additional horror arising from the possibility of their sea-banks failing and admitting the ocean at once upon them. The account given of the storm in the London Gazette, which occurred Nov. 22, 1686, is calculated to excite commiseration, though time has long since removed the survivors from temporal sufferings.

" Groningen, Nov. 26.—On Friday the 22d instant, it blew the whole day a most violent storm from the S. E. ; towards night the wind changed to the West, then to the N. W. afterwards to the N. E. and back again to the N. W. The weather continued thus tempestuous all night, accompanied with thunder and lightning ; the chimneys and roofs of a great many houses were blown down, and much more mischief was done, but it was not comparable to that which followed ;

followed; for the dykes not being able to resist the violence of the sea, agitated by these terrible storms, the whole country between this and Delfziel, being about eighteen English miles, was the next morning overwhelmed with water, which in many places was eight foot higher than the very dykes, and many people and thousands of cattle were drowned, the water breaking even through the walls of the town of Delfziel, to that height that the inhabitants were forced to betake themselves to their garrets and upper rooms for shelter. The whole village of Oterdam is in a manner swept away. At Termunderzyl, there is not one house left, above three hundred people being drowned there, and only nineteen escaping. Hereskes, Weywert, Woldendorp, and all the villages near the Eems, have suffered extremely. The Western quarter has likewise had its share in this calamity, and the highest lands have not escaped. On Sunday and yesterday it reached this city; the lower parts whereof are now all under water. From the walls of this city we can see nothing but the tops of houses and steeples that remain above water. In a word, the misery and desolation is greater than can be expressed.

“Groningen, Nov. 26.—It’s impossible to describe the present sad condition of this province, occasioned by a most terrible inundation that happened the 22d instant; the like has not been known these hundred years. The whole province, except the higher parts of this city, lies under water; whole villages have been swept away, and a great many people, with abundance of cattle, drowned; and those that have escaped, sheltering themselves in garrets and upper rooms, are in great distress for want of relief: nothing but lamentations, and the jangling of bells for help, is heard through the whole country; and though all possible care is taken to assist them from hence, and other places, yet there not being boats enough to afford help to all, it's to be feared many will be lost for want of it. At Oterdam, near Delfziel, but twenty-five persons have escaped; in the village of Peterborne there are but three houses left standing, and in general, all the houses that stood near the dyke have been swept away."

RECEPTION OF A BRITISH EMBASSY AT ROME.

As considerable agitation prevails respecting Catholic emancipation, it is gratifying to refer back to the period when Protestants were struggling for that religious freedom which some of our fellow-subjects now demand, in order to shew the close connexion which prevailed between the head of the Roman church and the last of our Monarchs of that faith. My authority is the London Gazette, and consequently authentic.

The Pope had been indisposed at the close of the year 1685, but had sufficiently recovered to receive the Earl of Castlemaine on the 8th of the following following January, as the Ambassador Extraordinary of his Britannic Majesty. The arms of the Papal See and those of England were placed on the front of the Earl's hotel a few days before, and were uncovered at day-break with great ceremony, and a flourish of trumpets, in the presence of numerous spectators, who greatly approved of the excellence of the workmanship.

About three o'clock, the Papal officers and attendants and many prelates waited upon the Ambassador, and the carriages of various Princes and Cardinals, sent to form the intended procession, assembled at the same hour. At four, Lord Castlemaine entered his coach, in company with six Archbishops, of whom Barzolini, not long before Nuncio in France, sat on his left hand; ten other coaches, occupied by Prelates, with servants in the livery of the British court, followed, and those of the Italian Princes closed the line of carriages.

Thirty footmen, twenty in cloaks, and the remainder habited in close-bodied coats, preceded the Earl's coach, eight pages walked on the sides, led by the Dean of the footmen, in a dress of black velvet, that of the pages was crimson velvet cloaks, deep laced with gold, embroidered with black, white, and blue silk, the linings of brocade, the ground blue and gold flowers, the trimmings were blue ribbands and gold lace, and their hats had plumes of white feathers.

The

The rest of the attendants, amounting to sixty in the aggregate, wore laced scarlet, lined with silk brocade. The Ambassador's gentleman of the horse rode a spirited Neapolitan charger, richly caparisoned.

The reader will regret to hear, that this splendid procession passed through streets overflowed by rain, and that the coaches described in the succeeding paragraphs were exposed to heavy showers during the whole of the ceremony. "His first coach is covered with crimson velvet, richly embroidered with gold, and lined with brocard of gold, with a rich embroidery round the cornice, and in the middle his Excellency's arms, all of embossed needle-work, of gold. The body of the coach is supported by four Tritons, delicately carved and gilded. On the shoulder of the hinder Triton, on the right hand, leans a great figure, representing Britannia, crowned with wreaths of oak leaves; on the other Triton leans a majestic figure, of the same bigness, representing Neptune; he and Britannia, like two deities, extend each a hand, and so bear up the Imperial crown of England; besides which, there are other figures curiously wrought and gilded: so that, besides the pleasure of the invention, and excellency of the work, the whole carriage looks like a mighty mass of entire gold.

"The second coach is covered with blue velvet, and also lined with a rich brocard, and, for the embroidery embroidery and other richness, differs very little from the former (though it does in the design), being likewise curiously adorned with several figures, and other carved work.

“The third also differs very little from the two former, except that the outside is covered with leather, edged with gold and silk lace, and gilt massy brass work: the rest of his Excellency’s coaches are likewise very noble and rich.”

A perusal of the above description forcibly reminds us of the clumsy vehicles, in which our present Monarch, his Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Mayor of London, are compelled to rumble on state occasions through the streets of the metropolis, which are certainly objects for wonder rather than admiration; particularly when in the first and last instances those machines are compared with the beautiful and delicately constructed carriages of the Master of the Horse and the two Sheriffs. Fortunately I have it in my power to annex an engraving of a coach, the drawing of which was made about the time of the event related in this article.

The citizens of Rome, despising the opposition of the elements, crowded their streets and the balconies of their houses, and, elated by the magnificence of the spectacle before them, shouted “Viva il grand Re d’Ingelterra” till the Ambassador reached Monte Cavallo, where the Papal guard made a lane, through which the lay nobility and clergy

clergy proceeded to the Pope's chamber. The Earl afterwards passed half an hour with Cardinal Cibo, and returned by the light of wax torches to his hotel.

ILLUSTRATION OF TURKISH MANNERS.

We are all well acquainted with the sudden resentments, discontents, and ambitious projects of the Spahis, Janissaries, and more elevated ranks of the Turkish nation. Furious in the indulgence of their passions, and at all times ready for revolution, those in power know their probable destiny, and consequently meet it with more fortitude than would be discovered beyond the limits of Turkey—an instance of which will form the sequel of this article.—A fierce insurrection of the common soldiers took place in the year 1686, which ended in the elevation of a favourite to the office of Sultan, who is described in the London Gazette to have been a grave and studious man. This Soliman had the moderation to preserve the life of the deposed Sultan Mahomet, but the cruelty to separate him from his children.

One of the principal mutineers, a Spahi, named Cochink Mahomet, soon obtained the reward of his exertions and their punishment. The boldness and ferocity of Cochink induced him to assume an air of command, which his fellow-soldiers, knowing the necessity of subordination, even in their own villainous attempts against obedience, dience, submitted to without a dissentient voice. Confirmed according to appearances in his new power, the great men of the empire approached him with terror, soliciting his protection with rich presents. Cochink lodged in a magnificent palace, situated in the Hippodrome, and was always attended by a strong guard. This availed him nothing, for he sealed his doom by temporising with the army of plunderers, giving them large promises and extremely small rewards.

“ Was it for this,” said the soldiers, “ that we intrusted you to speak for us, that you might be lodged yourself in a palace, and be cloathed with sables, whilst we lie ragged in the Mosque-yards and the corners of the streets? And are we now to be contented, because you are grown rich by making bargains to our prejudice?” Inflamed by the utterance of these reproaches, they seized their victim, dragged him from his horse, and cutting him with their knives and beating him with sticks, they soon rendered Cochink a mere mass of matter. The tragedy ended in the plunder of his palace.

Not long before the revolution, the jealousy of the then ministry caused the death of a chief at Rhodes, whose name was Ibrahim. The Beg of the galley, employed to convey certain deposed Mufti and the Capigee Bachi to Rhodes, having received some acts of friendship from Ibrahim, was extremely anxious to discover whether he formed any part of the object of the Bachi's visit; but such was the art and address of the latter, that he completely lulled all suspicion, and the Beg, overjoyed at the supposed security of his friend, waited on him with his congratulations. Those were interrupted by a tumultuous assembly around the gates: Ibrahim doubted; but the good Beg insisted that the people waited to see the deposed Mufti: Ibrahim was incredulous.

At this interesting moment, the Capigee Bachi entered, advanced to Ibrahim, kissed his vest, seated himself, and to an enquiry of what news? replied, all was well. The remainder of this dreadful interview strongly paints the character of the Turk, which almost soars into sublimity. The fearless Ibrahim ordered coffee, partook of it with his guests, and conversed with them on matters of no interest. At length, the messenger of death produced a paper from his bosom; Ibrahim sat with an infant on his knee, which he caressed during the intervals of conversation, and received the order; having read it, he burst into tears, kissed the child, and dismissed it by an attendant; he then exclaimed, "What have I done! they have taken all my estate; ought not that to content them, but they must have my life? Oh treacherous world!"

One of the Capigee's officers having brought forward a strong thick cord, Ibrahim eyed it with disdain. "This," said he, "is only fit to strangle a dog."

a dog." Turning to a domestic, he commanded him to bring a bow-string. This he wet in the act of ablution previous to prayers, and making the fatal knot himself, completed his orisons, when the slaves did their office, and Ibrahim ceased to exist.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AT COPENHAGEN, 1689.

Four large Theatres, and other places of public amusement, have been burnt to the ground within the last twenty-five years in London. Most happily, each of the conflagrations occurred after the close of the Theatre for the night; and we have been spared the horrors attending a fire during the performance. The inhabitants of the capital of Denmark, less fortunate, witnessed the destruction of a magnificent palace, and the audience of its Theatre, in the same moment. The building was profusely ornamented with carving, which the London Gazette calls juniper-work; the cieling was painted on canvas, in oil, and there were but two small doors. The place was crowded with the better classes of the people, and many of the nobility; a lamp placed too near some carving set it on fire, the flame ascended, and immediately reached the inflammable cieling. Involved in smoke, and rendered desperate by their situation, every person pressed to the doors, through which 280 were incapable of passing; those perished, and numbers escaped dreadfully scorched and injured.

THE INSTABILITY OF HUMAN GREATNESS

EXEMPLIFIED.

However instructive or useful it may be to speculate on the uncertainty of all things, little that is new can be said on the subject: every historical fact illustrates this point. The life of James II. of England, his illegal acts, and his abdication of the throne, are narrated in every history of the empire; but the last effervescence of his joy on the birth of a son is perhaps at present known only to those who have read the early numbers of the London Gazette; that publication furnishes several curious instances of the excessive zeal exhibited at various foreign courts, which follow in a state of abridgement.

Mr. Innes, principal of the Scots college in Paris, selected the anniversary of St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland, to demonstrate the loyalty to which he was undoubtedly prompted. From the description conveyed to us, it appears, that his transparencies of the Royal arms of England, and those of the young Prince, his obelisks, and numerous lamps distributed in profusion, and his superb fireworks, were very little short of some of the late exhibitions at Paris, making due allowance for the inferior means of the principal more than a hundred years past, compared with the ability of the present government of France. A grand collation closed the pleasures of the evening, which which were promoted by the attendance of the Royal musicians.

Sir Gabriel Sylvius, envoy extraordinary from England to the court of Denmark, gave an entertainment profuse and excellent in every particular, at which some of the Royal family, the Ambassadors, and the Ministers of State attended; the various healths were announced by discharges of cannon, and the populace drank to excess from several fountains of claret and white wine, which were placed in front of the Ambassador's house.

At night, the same area facing the sea exhibited an amphitheatre, with transparencies of the arms of England and Wales; beyond those, several steps appeared to lead to a tower, and on that the King's arms, represented in artificial fire, burnt for three hours; the Prince's motto, a figure of Britannia, and many pyramids, were of the same fierce composition. A considerable expanse of water ornamented the space before the hotel, in which was a jet d'eau, 30 feet in height. This Sir Gabriel selected as the grand theatre of his fireworks; those were very splendid; and finally, part of them exploded at the bottom of the basin, whence the mingled elements ascended to a great elevation, sparkling with excessive brilliancy. The King and Queen had been expected to honour the ball in the evening with their presence, but sent an excuse by the Prince Royal and his brother, who were conducted by Sir Gabriel through a number of emblematical transparencies to a magnificent hall brilliantly illuminated and covered with mirrors, which, reflecting each light, rendered the effect almost too dazzling for the organs of vision, and the view of a superb throne.

Another room contained refreshments for those wearied by pleasure.

The Earl of Carlingford strongly excited the curiosity and approbation of the Court and inhabitants of Vienna by entertainments nearly similar to those at Copenhagen.

Edmond Poley, Esq. who was envoy extraordinary at Stockholm, received the intelligence of the birth of the Prince during the absence of the Swedish Court. Upon the return of the Royal family to the metropolis, Mr. Poley, attended by a train of English gentlemen, conveyed in twenty coaches, waited on his Swedish Majesty, and acquainted him at a public audience of the happy event which had just occurred. Some days after, he invited the principal Senators and King's officers to an entertainment, when he ordered all the British ships in the port to be dressed with flags and moored, so as to produce a fine effect viewed from the city, while three others, provided with cannon, were to fire salutes by signal on drinking each health, fifteen to those of the Royal family and nine to the guests.

The trumpets and kettle-drums of the Royal household were sent to promote the pleasures of the banquet by sounding at the arrival of the company and the pronouncing of the toasts. A machine, contrived for the purpose of supplying the populace with wine, erected before the house, supported a large painting of their Britannic Majesties in a rich frame; an arch, covered with natural flowers, connected this structure with the Envoy's house.

"Under their Majesties' pictures," adds the Gazette, "were placed the King's arms, of a larger size, with the supporters carved proportionably, and the pipes so disposed, that the wine was to run out of the mouths of the lion and unicorn. Under the King's arms was a large table, fairly painted and adorned according to art, with Dorick pillars on each side, with their cornices, capitals, and bases, and between them was written in fair gold letters the happy occasion of the solemnity.

In the middle whereof were encircled with olive branches these following verses made upon the present subject; the whole being adorned with flowers and so much art as made a very handsome appearance, and very suitable to the occasion.

“ After the meat was taken off, there was served up a very fine desert, with many great pyramids of dried sweetmeats; between which were placed all such fruits, iced creams, and such other varieties as the season afforded. At dinner, there were twelve sorts of wine, and all extraordinary good in their kind.

“ The Senators having continued at table till near seven o'clock, about an hour after they took their leaves, and then removed to see the fireworks, which were prepared upon the water before the great bridge, amidst the ships which lay there; and

and for a signal at the beginning of the firework there were fired twenty-one great guns. The reason the fireworks could not be near his house was, that, most of the houses of the town being both built of and covered with wood, there would have been great danger of fire in so hot a season of the year; and the same apprehensions hindered his causing any bonfires to be made.

“When the firework began, the King and Prince of Holstein were pleased to place themselves in an island hard by to see it. The body of the firework consisted of a castle with all its towers and flags, which was so placed as to move upon the water, and from all its several towers cast great quantities of rockets and other sorts of artificial fires; amongst which were several balls, which, after having risen in the air, discharged some grenadoes, fell into the water, and after a little time rose up again, and filled the air with great quantities of rockets and stars, &c. to the great entertainment of the beholders.

“As the fireworks began, the trumpets and kettle-drums aboard the ships did their part; most of the English merchants being also on board, added to the ceremony by their acclamations. It lasted about an hour, and was concluded with as many great guns as had been fired at the beginning, and with their Majesties and the Prince's healths, which were drank with two hogs-heads of wine the Envoy had sent on board, and lasted lasted with continued shooting till two or three o'clock in the morning.

“The number of people of all qualities entertained at the Envoy's house, according to the laudable custom of this country, was very great; and as wine was very plentifully offered to all people of any kind of fashion, so they were not sparing in partaking of it: but all passed without any disorder.”

Such were the joys of the summer: the winter following, the infatuated James passed down the Thames silently, dejected, and no longer a King. He would have left his dominions in a boat destitute of ballast; his conductors came on shore to obtain it, when part of his subjects compelled him to return to the metropolis; having reached Rochester on his second attempt, he left that place at eleven o'clock in the night of the 23d of December, and braved the horrors of the sea in a miserable fishing-boat, in which he reached Ambleuse in safety, accompanied by the Duke of Berwick. The Queen and Prince of Wales were received at St. Germain en Laye on the 19th of the same month by the King of France, and treated with great respect.

PRINCE CHARLES OF BRANDENBURGH AND THE COUNTESS OF SALMOUN.

The anecdote now presented to the reader was derived from the 19th number of the Post Boy, June

June 22d, 1695; and possesses sufficient interest to excite the commiseration of each sex, and even the indignation of the ladies. The Prince had frequently seen the Countess of Salmoun, a woman celebrated for her virtue, her beauty, and her accomplishments. Those had previously procured her a husband, whom she lost, and she was a widow of twenty-eight at the above period. The qualities already mentioned rendered it impossible Prince Charles should succeed in his addresses in any other than an honourable way. Convinced of this fact, and assured of her approbation, he formed the rash resolution of marrying the Countess in defiance of the displeasure of the reigning Elector his elder brother.

On the day fixed for this purpose, he proposed a party of pleasure to La Venerie, a palace belonging to the Sovereign, where several gentlemen accompanied him without the least suspicion of the real object of the visit. The Prince at length declared his resolution, which was at first treated as a jest, but the appearance of the Countess, attended by a priest, solved their doubts, and arguments warmly urged by every individual present against the match and its inevitable consequences served only to confirm the ardent lover in his determination.

Fired with indignation at the imprudence and obstinacy of the Prince, his Master of the Horse declared he would rather die than suffer the marriage

riage to proceed. He then ordered the priest to depart, which exasperated the Prince beyond controul, and he even drew his sword upon his faithful officer. This served as a signal to the whole party, and the weapon of each pointed to the breast of the brother of their Sovereign. Fortunately reason soon resumed her sway, the swords were sheathed, and the band of friends then discovered that terror had deprived the lovers of their ecclesiastick, who fled, and interrupted the ceremony for that time.

The Master of the Horse rode post to Casal, where the Duke of Savoy was employed in besieging the city, and laid the preceding particulars before him. The Duke immediately demanded to see Prince Charles, who refused the summons; but the former was more successful in securing the Lady, and the unfortunate Countess became a prisoner in a convent, without the most distant hope of release.

A process was instituted to inquire into the affair, and it was declared, that no marriage had taken place between Prince Charles of Brandenburg and the Countess of Salmoun, which, were the fact otherwise, must have been null and void. The vexation, grief, and irritation, produced by these events, had nearly proved fatal to the Prince; he, however, gradually recovered; and we hear of him afterwards as commanding part of the besieging army under the Duke of Savoy.

LITERARY RIVALSHIP BETWEEN THE KING OF
AT CAEN, IN NORMANDY, 1695.

The cause of the rivalry alluded to was even the celebrated Monarch, the invincible warrior, the sapient legislator, the magnificent, munificent, and vain Lewis the Fourteenth, to whom the people of France bowed the knee, prostrated speech and the pen, erected statues and almost worshiped, an Emperor through inclination of all Europe, and, by fate and decided opposition, merely a King over his own provinces. And now that an act of resumption, decreed by the sovereign people, has deprived the antient dynasty, of which he was a member, of their votive honours, neither bronze nor marble convey his fame and glory to posterity, unless in fragments preserved for the excellence of their workmanship!!

It is not in the compiler's power to present his readers with the letter addressed by Lewis to the King of Persia which produced the following answer.

“God is the Master of Glory.

“Lewis, the fourteenth of that name, Emperor of great reputation, who art the Sovereign Monarch of divers famous kingdoms and provinces, as Normandy, Brittany, Aquitain, Gascoin, Poitou, Xantonge, Limosin, Bourdeaux, Dauphine, Grenoble, Provence, Perigord, Yonraine, Le Maine, Nivernois, Nivernois, Angouleme, Tholouse, Picardie, Angiers, Lionnois, Campagne, Paris, Chartres, Calais, Dunkirk, and other places and countries in great abundance.

“ Your Majesty shall know that your letter, full of amity, is arrived in this part in a happy moment and a fortunate hour, wherein, by the hand of the secret providence of the Creator of heaven and earth, the accomplishment of desires were marked upon the seven spheres of the heavens, in that same manner as the ladies of attire do with their dextrous hands adorn fine brides, and order the jewels of their dress in the closets of pleasure. And seeing in your letters we perceived to shine the marks of the continuance of your union and good understanding, which hath filled us with joy, and imprinted in our spirit sentiments of amity and acknowledgement, just as the garden flowers in the spring time send forth their odours sweet as the amber, and as agreeable as musk, wherewith they embalm the smell and the brain : We forthwith gave order to the Ministers of this Empire, which may it be of eternal duration ; and we commanded the Officers of this Crown, which God continue to the end of all ages, to expedite and put in execution in every point the affairs which you were pleased to acquaint us with, in terms so amicable and so eloquent in your agreeable writing. And in hopes that the amity and sincerity which you have for us will invite you to entertain

our correspondence by letters, which may serve as a key to open the gates of the heart of a perfect union. Your Majesty may rest assured on our part, that the desires and purposes that you make known to us, which shall be conformable to the different events of fortune, and the course of the days and nights, shall at the same time be put in execution, and accomplished, with the assistance of the Almighty, whom we pray that the sun of your reign may shine perpetually upon the horizon of glory and felicity."

The above is a specimen of the glowing style of the East, which has many beauties, and much of what the English call bombast in its composition. The aforesaid Dean, unconscious of the fact, writes an address, and surpasses the Persian in hyperbole, and becomes in the midst of his raptures absolutely blasphemous.

"MY LORD,

"Amongst the most glorious titles which the King of Kings assumes to himself in the Holy Scripture, that of the God of Armies is one; he would have us to honour as Gods those Princes and Lords who fight for his glory, and he calls them Gods himself. If there was ever a Prince, my Lord, upon the earth who did merit that so glorious name, it is without doubt our great Monarch: he is a God to the confederate Princes, as Moses was to Pharoah, whereas God hath armed him and clothed him with his zeal and power in favour favour of the true religion; and as God did formerly make use of Joshua and David, nay, even of his angels, to defeat the enemies of his people, he does always make use of you, my Lord, as a lively representative of his great power, and one of the greatest heroes of the world, to overcome the enemies of his religion and this state. Therefore it is, my Lord, that we are not to fear that they will make any descent upon this province, seeing we have the good fortune to have you sent for our guardian angel from the Mighty God and the Mightiest of Kings. This obliges us, my Lord, to come and pay you our respects and obeisance, and to assure you of our vows, our prayers, and our sacrifices for your preservation."

INSTANCE OF UNCOMMON DEPRAVITY.

The names of the persons concerned in the extraordinary case now to be related are omitted in the Flying Post of August 8th, 1695, from which it was compiled. Dr. B., a clergyman of considerable property, resident at Greenwich, and a bachelor, was related to the wife of a man designated by the initial S, at one time a messenger, and at another period the keeper of a coffee-house in Ram Alley.

Dr. B., being of a benevolent and generous turn of mind, patronised and assisted S. and his family, and adopted one of his daughters who lived with him at Greenwich. In the year 1695, the good ecclesiastick suffered under a severe indisposition, and made his will, in which he gave handsome legacies to the wife of S. his children, and a competent portion to his adopted child.

S. visited the young woman during the Doctor's illness, who, elated with their good fortune, informed her father of the circumstances of the bequests, and innocently offered to shew him the will, which she actually procured. S. formed his plan of operations in an instant, and soon prevailed upon the silly girl to entrust him with it for a few days, under a promise of then restoring it.

He returned to London with his prize, and, when prepared to imitate the Doctor's signature, he went to a scrivener in a gown and cassock, and, personating Dr. B., he dictated a will, which conveyed all the money and effects of his patron to his wife and their children; and to secure the house, &c. at Greenwich, he caused a deed of gift to be drawn up in favour of the same inheritors. After the completion of the instrument, S. enquired whether the scrivener could not procure from his neighbours respectable witnesses of his signing them; he replied in the affirmative; and those appearing, every thing succeeded to the wishes of S., who went to Greenwich, and contrived to deposit the fictitious will in the place of the real.

Had the Doctor died, S. would have enriched himself himself and family, as the former was nearly isolated in the community; but the Doctor recovered, and completely annihilated his hopes, though not the revenge that event produced in his breast. To gratify this diabolical passion, he is said to have applied to a quack doctor, between whom and an assistant in iniquity, he promised to divide 100*l.*, in case they succeeded in administering a dose of poison effectually. Failure in his pecuniary engagements to the assistant, provoked him to inform the persecuted Dr. B. of his danger. S., watchful as a lynx, immediately absconded, but the quack was seized, examined, and admitted to bail.

NEWSPAPER POLITICAL CRITICISM, 1695.

The extract which ensues will afford the reader an opportunity of judging of the state of the above description of literature in the reign of William and Mary.

“Our French letters bring us an account of an apotheosis (or deifying) represented in three acts by Father Longuemarre, Professor of Rhetorick in the Jesuits College at Rennes, under the name of Laodamas, in the honour of the Duke of Luxembourg’s memory, which, amongst other hyperbolic flights in commendation of the said Mareschal, contains the following verses:

“Toujours terrible dans la guerre,
Cent fois nous l’avons vû, seul braver le trepas.

Faire marcher par tout l'effroi devant ses pas ;
 Il étoit en ces lieux plus craint que le tonnerre, Effrayant par son nom les Princes de la terre.

“ Which may be paraphrased in English thus :

“ Brave Luxembourg, most terrible in war,
 Outbrav'd grim death a hundred times a day,
 And thunder, like his terror, sounded far,
 Earth's Princes at his name did run away.

Which an ingenious critick makes some reflections upon, and this amongst others, viz. That by the Poet's expressions one would be induced to think, that Luxembourg had been General to some Fairy King or Emperor of the Moon ; for seeing he was so terrible to the Princes of the earth, it would imply that he was not earthly himself. But, passing over that stretch of invention, he confutes the Jesuit solidly, and tells him, that his hero Laodamas, alias Luxembourg, did usually entrench himself before and behind, and had his own turn of being frightened by those Princes of the earth : as for instance, at the battle of St. Quintins, and some of the last battles in Flanders, when he was attacked in his entrenchments and forced to fight and thereupon he answers him as follows :

“ J'y reconnois ton nouveau Mars,
 Tremblant derriere ses ramparts,
 France, mais pour le Roi de la Grande Bretagne Et l'intrepide Chef des legions d'Espagne,

Qu'il

Qu'il y reconnoitra ne les connoitra pas.
 Je vais en deux mots les depeindre
 Ces heros que le ciel forma pour les combats :
 Leur default est de ne rien craindre.

“ Which may be Englished thus :

“ See, France, how thy false God of War
 From danger keeps himself afar,
 And in his trenches quakes for fear,
 When Britain's God of War draws near,
 With that great hero in his train,
 Bavaria, General for Spain ;
 Two Captains fram'd by Heaven's decree
 To fight for Europe's liberty ;
 And to the world it doth appear,
 They have no fault but want of fear.”

THE ATHENIAN MERCURY

Was originally published in numbers, consisting each of a folio leaf printed on both sides, and by Dunton in the Poultry. This periodical work appeared on Tuesdays and Saturdays, and partook of the nature of a newspaper in no other way than by the insertion of advertisements. The matter invariably consisted of questions on every subject and science, with their solutions. The Athenian Mercury, in common with most other new literary projects, had a rival.

Dunton distinguished his shop by the sign of a Raven, which was certainly an eccentric emblem, and suggested to the conductors of the London Mercury

Mercury the whimsical thought of presenting their purchasers, with a head-piece composed of Mr. Dunton's bird of dire presage, bearing on its back Minerva's favourite attendant, the sapient, grave, and solemn owl.

Without attempting to compare the merits of these Mercuries, which would be a laborious and thankless task, or entering into a criticism on particular articles, the compiler feels convinced he shall oblige many of his readers by presenting them with the following moral and excellent lines from the 13th Number of Vol. XI. which infinitely surpass the major part of the poetry written in the reign of William and Mary.

“ Quest. 1.

Which fain I would, but weak is my endeavour:

Disdains his tender conjugal caresses;

And but because it is a mode of vice,

She least affects that which she most possesses.

I blush

I blush to say 't—'tis me alone she loves,
 By artless methods she reveal'd her flame:
 I hear whate'er the fair deluder moves,
 And sighing wish I might confess the same.

By Heaven, I love the syren more than life,
 And yet I know it is a crime to love her:
 Fain I'd declare the duty of a wife,
 But want both words and courage to reprove her.

O teach me, Athens! to be bold and great,
 Help me to get my reason up in arms:
 I would collect myself and rule my fate,
 Be true to Heaven, and stupid to her charms!

Answ. 1.

Yoursel must help yourself to avoid a sin,
 Which if you would, more strong be your endeavour;
 She may entice, but cannot force you in:
 O think it heaven to shun, and think it hell to have her!

What is more sacred than another's right?
 What stronger ties than nuptial vows and joys?
 Then curb that furious torrent of delight
 Which her eyes give, and fly her syren's voice.

3.

For love of heaven, her lawless love despise,
 Like serpents twine, fly her unchaste caresses:
 Be virtuous still, though still the mode is vice,
 Nor ravish what another yet possesses.

Keep but thy modesty, in vain she loves ;
 Keep virtue's last and stronger barrier, shame ;
 But never hear what the false charmer moves,
 Each word will fan the spark to a raging flame.

If her you love, it must be more than life ;
 'Tis sin, 'tis shame, 'tis death, 'tis hell to love
 her :
 Fly far, O fly the syren of a wife,
 And at safe distance, if at all, reprove her.

How happy were we, could our humble verse
 The sparks of dying virtue in thee raise !
 Nay, round the world the noble flame disperse,
 We civil garlands ask, and wear who will the bays."

REMARKABLE INSTANCE OF SUICIDE.

Mr. George Goringe, a gentleman of Staffordshire, excited dreadful alarm at Newport Pagnel in March 1696, by the determined manner with which he repelled every effort to save him from self-

self-destruction. The last scene of his life will serve for the present purpose; and may the following narrative (should it meet the eyes of despondency) rouse the party to a sense of the atrocity exhibited by Mr. G.! He arrived at the town already mentioned in a stage-coach, and remained at the Saracen's-head Inn: informing the attendants, after he had dined, that he was indisposed, they sent for Dr. Waller, who bled him; at the conclusion of the operation, several persons entered the room, upon which the pretended patient drew a pistol from his pocket, and presenting it at them alternately, commanded their instant departure; he then ordered a bed, and almost undressing himself, waited till the chambermaid withdrew, when he fired at his head, and severely wounded some part not immediately mortal.

The people of the house rushed into the apartment, and found Mr. G. sitting upright in the bed with a second pistol in his hand, which he declared he would discharge at the first person who should approach him. Mr. G. having a servant with him, the poor fellow entreated that he might be an exception; but his obdurate master refused, and added, he was ready to hear any thing that the people present wished to say.

A Mr. Duncomb resolved to make an effort to save the maniac, and had his name announced as that of a physician. This stratagem so far succeeded as to enable him to seize the hand which held

held the pistol; at the very instant when the worthy gentleman would have wrested it from him, the two maids of the house who attended with a candle fled, and left the parties to contend in total darkness: thus circumstanced, Mr. D. very properly resolved on a speedy retreat, which he effected in safety; and his antagonist, now on the alert, would not suffer a man to enter the room, but lay on the bed occasionally conversing with the female servants, whom he informed that he had determined to die by the means he had adopted, which was preferable to a lingering death.

Several persons who felt deeply interested were at one time led to suppose that Mr. G. had fallen asleep, and sent his servant to ascertain the fact; the wary domestic approached with caution, and perceived the unhappy man extended, with the muzzle of the pistol close to his head: Mr. G. started, and aiming at the intruder, bade him instantly depart: on his perceiving that he was promptly obeyed, he resumed his first position, and for the last time. The feelings of every person acquainted with this most extraordinary case, were excited to the highest degree of irritation, and holding a council of what was best to be done, they resolved to assemble at the door, and rush thence to the bed, hoping to secure the suicide ere he could recover his faculties from the surprise consequent to their method of proceeding: the fatal moment arrived, arrived, they darted forward, the pistol was instantaneously discharged, and in the same dreadful moment Mr. Goringe breathed his last.

Such was the fortitude or resolution evinced by the miserable self-destroyer, that though he was often heard in prayer, neither complaint nor expression of agony escaped him, although his torture from the wound must have been excessively acute, the following sentences were found in his pocket-book :

“ My reason for killing myself is, first, because I would not be rendered a reproach unto, and derision of all mankind, and only become the sport of my fellow-creatures, and thereby be incapable of serving any of them ; but rather than live in perpetual misery, I resolve wholly to trust in God’s mercy and forgiveness, his pardon of all my sins, but especially this, through the merits and mercy of Jesus Christ, not thinking it more sin to kill myself than to kill a man, which might have been my fate if ever I had been in the army ; and in killing myself, I kill but a man already full of grief and misery, which to do, is but a piece of mercy, to deliver myself from the evils to come upon me, and my incapacity to be serviceable to mankind ; and upon these considerations, Juras ire per altum semel quam semper.

“ Envy and prosperity have been my ruin ; and though the devil has put them into possession of my temporals, they will meet with a reward. I was an entire and constant lover of my wife, though at some times I may have expressed the contrary, to try her; a true friend to whomever I pretended, and all my designs just, where they have not been perverted by evil men. Let the sense of this judge of my being compos mentis. I desire my executors and trustees to give 40s. instead of 10, to the purchase of rings, mentioned in my will, and to raise £1000 out of the estate for my daughter."

was

CAPTAIN ST. JOHN, OF THE FOREST OF GRESIGNE.

This person had been quarter-master to a troop of horse, and through some cause, unexplained, became the leader of a ferocious set of banditti, whose principle of action seemed a compound of policy and cowardice. The title of Captain originated from his brethren in arms; and their residence was the forest of Gresigne, situated between Montauban and Alby, in the province of Upper Languedoc. St. John kept an elderly and very homely Bohemian woman constantly with him, bearing the honourable title of his wife, which the lady wished to confirm by exhibiting her person in the richest apparel the Captain and his men collected through their peculiar mode of thinking and acting.

bourhood to pass and repass unmolested, while their property remained perfectly secure in the villages and detached dwellings; those who had any pretensions to rank or opulence were particularly respected; and if at any time the party committed a mistake and robbed a nobleman, restitution immediately followed: by these arts it became the interest of every person within their power to conciliate rather than provoke them, and hence proceeded the frequent visits paid by the gentry to St. John, who entertained them hospitably, and led them into the forest with his dogs well experienced and trained to hunting. It was the poor and defenceless stranger to whom these villains looked for remuneration; and him they plundered without mercy, though it is said they never shed his blood.

The Captain, presuming upon the impunity he supposed he had established, would frequently enter the large towns near the forest under a strong escort of his men, and retire at his pleasure in perfect security; but though justice delayed the hour of retribution, it at length arrived; and though St. John saw all around him passive, he found that the Parliament of Toulouse acted on different grounds; that body decreed his arrest, which was once attempted without success: the 6th of April, 1696, proved a more fortunate day to the police; they apprehended hended the Captain, but not before he had received a mortal wound, and his son was slain.

LOUIS XIV. AND M. CORNELIUS BURDEAU.

The above gentleman was a celebrated mathematician, and had by unwearied attention to the principles of mechanics, as applied to complicated movements in clock-work, invented one which he brought to perfection in two years. M. Burdeau's clock, though said to have been entirely original, certainly was not so, as my authority admits it resembled that at Medenblick in the Netherlands, which sounded the hours in a very silly manner through the operations of a coachman, who appeared to drive a vehicle with horses round the limits assigned him, and at intervals struck the bell as many times as announced the different periods of the day.

The French artist saw the unmeaning folly exhibited by the contriver of the Medenblick machine in its true light, and therefore determined to shew the world that he could not only invent but flatter, in perfection. M. Burdeau placed Louis le Grand on a rich throne, where, seated in all the pomp of France, he beheld the electors of the German circles and the princes and dukes of Italy advance, bend the body, and, retiring, chime the quarters with their canes; the monarchs of Europe were reserved for the more dignified office of informing the grand monarque of the progress of the hours, but in the same humiliating manner.

The idea was new, and highly acceptable to the ridiculous vanity of the Frenchmen of 1696; they assembled from all parts to view the clock and its accompaniments, rapturously applauded the author of their raptures, and at length encouraged him to make a public exhibition of the princes of Europe employed in paying homage to the inflated Louis.

Unfortunately for Burdeau, he advertised his intention in the newspapers, and attempted too much in order to gratify the vast crowd collected in consequence. Knowing the stubborn and unyielding habits of William III. of England towards his master, the artist determined to screw his representative to a very humble obeisance when his turn approached; William, thus compelled, bowed extremely low indeed; at this instant the machinery snapped asunder, and threw Louis prostrate from his chair at the feet of the British king. The accident spread in the form of an omen in every direction; the ministry informed Louis of every circumstance;—and poor Burdeau went to the Bastille.

ROYAL CUSTOM IN FRANCE, 1697 — ABOLISHED — AND REVIVED BY THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

Those who are familiar with the antient history of France, and remember the character of the people during the reign of Louis XIV. will readily subscribe to the truth of the position, that nothing appeared less probable than that the abolition of royalty should happen in the reign of his great-grandson Louis XVI.

The ambition of the former of these monarchs, and his severe exactions, were certainly incentives to discontent; but if such prevailed, the splendour of the court operated in dazzling the senses of the majority, who exulted in every victory obtained by the armies of their king; and by the sole operation of conceit and vanity, each individual conceived himself personally interested in his glory. Inspired with a most singular excess of loyalty, statues arose at the command of the publick to the honour of Louis, surrounded by emblems of conquest absurd and misapplied, and inscriptions equally ridiculous, flattering, and untrue.

The king enjoyed this universal homage with infinite complacency, and never failed to return thanks to the Divinity for successes, according to antient and prescribed usage, that made each moral man's heart ache. On the 21st of August, 1697, the pious Louis addressed the Archbishop of Paris in the following letter, which the reader will will have the kindness to compare with an extract, dated in July 1809:

“COUSIN,

“Aeth having been reduced to my obeisance at the opening of this campaign, this happy beginning could not be followed by a more glorious and important expedition, than that of the taking of Barcelona, the siege of which I ordered at the same time to be carried on by land and by sea, by my cousin the Duke de Vendome, and by Count d’Estrees. All Europe hath seen the almost unconquerable difficulties of this enterprize: the Spaniards, looking upon Barcelona as the strongest bulwark of their States, have defended it within and without with an army not much less than mine, and have shewed all the courage and constancy that nation is always capable of; but at last, after two and fifty days open trenches, and divers most vigorous actions on both sides, and so much the more obstinate on the side of the enemies, that, besides the help of their fortification, the troops they had within were often relieved by those they had without; they have thought that they got glory enough by stopping so long the valour of mine, and the capacity of the chief that commands them; and fearing the consequence of a general assault, they have capitulated, and yielded up the place to my cousin the Duke de

Vendome,

Vendome, with the citadel of Mountjoy, which my army had not been able to attack at the same time. This conquest, by which I am become master of Catalonia, obliges me to give thanks to God, whose goodness does not cease to favour my enterprizes, and to bestow his blessings upon my arms. Therefore I write this letter to you, to tell you, that my intention is, that you do cause Te Deum to be sung in the Metropolitan church of our good city of Paris, on the day and hour that the great Master or Master of Ceremonies shall tell you from me, and I order him to invite my Courts, and such as are used to assist in the like ceremonies: Hereupon, my Cousin, I pray God to keep you, &c. Written at Versailles the 21st of August, 1697."

The causes and events which led to the French Revolution cannot be related and discussed in the present instance; it will be quite sufficient to remind those who peruse this article, of the period when regenerated France swore in the most solemn manner to renounce royalty, and all its ramifications and customs, for ever; when the magnificent cathedral of Nôtre Dame at Paris lost all the honours lavished on it by piety and ostentation, and the bare walls witnessed the introduction of a frail female, under the new and scandalous title of the Goddess of Reason—a goddess who taught her votaries to inscribe "Death is an eternal sleep" on the gates of their cemeteries.

Such was France, and such were Frenchmen, when an individual, who executed the ireful commands of her rulers in a limited military capacity in a distant province, distinguished for its invincible loyalty, began to develop those talents for personal aggrandizement which have since transformed him from a fierce republican to an Emperor, and from the destroyer of altars to their restorer and ardent protector.

He found the people worn out and exhausted with terror, half of them deprived of their relatives by the axe and proscriptions, and thoroughly satiated with new forms of government; the moment had arrived when the French panted for a settled state of society, and were ready to rescind all their oaths in rejection of monarchy: thus the favourite Buonaparte ascended the throne of Louis XIV.; like him he had his victories, and at length his bishops, archbishops, and his good city of Paris; those he addressed to sing Te Deum, almost in the words of his predecessor, and adds the succeeding remarkable passages:

"Though our Lord Jesus Christ sprang from the blood of David, he sought no worldly empire: on the contrary, he required that in concerns of this life men should obey Cæsar. His great object was the deliverance and salvation of souls: We, the inheritor of Cæsar's power, are firmly

resolved to maintain the independence of our throne, and the inviolability of our rights. We shall persevere in the restoration of the great work of the worship of God; we shall communicate to its ministers that respectability which we alone can give them; we shall listen to their voice in all that concerns spiritual matters and affairs of conscience.

“We shall not be drawn aside from the great end which we strive to attain, and in which we have hitherto succeeded in part—the restoration of the altars of our divine worship; nor suffer ourselves to be persuaded, that these principles (as Greeks, English Protestants, and Calvinists affirm) are inconsistent with the independence of thrones and nations. God has enlightened us enough to remove such errors far from us. Our subjects entertain no such fear,” &c. &c.

SWINDLING, IN 1697.

This art has arrived at very great perfection, as we are officially informed by the various police offices; but it must be admitted that in the following instance the party concerned had nearly attained modern excellence in the profession. We are not honoured with his name; however, the gentleman arrived from Holland by a packet, and landed at Harwich pennyless; it was night, and he knew not where to obtain a bed; fertile in invention, a scheme soon occurred, which he put in practice without delay, by taking off his breeches breeches and throwing them into the sea; he then folded a long scarlet cloak closely round him, and inquiring for an inn, was directed to one, where he ordered a fowl for supper, and three bottles of wine afterwards, which the landlord shared by invitation; they discussed the affairs of the two nations, were delighted with each other's company, and parted perfect friends.

The swindler was on the alert, and began his operations early in the morning by a furious knocking; the chamberlain no sooner appeared before him, than he demanded his breeches; the servant protested his own innocence, and maintained the impossibility of any person having access to the room during the night; the fellow knew the article in question could not be produced, and confident of success, he vociferated for justice, till the landlord required an explanation of the disturbance; the loss was once more stated, with threats of punishment: alarmed for the reputation of his house, and unable to bring the least evidence in his own favour, or that of his servants, the innkeeper thought it most convenient to compromise the affair, and demanded what sum of money the stolen property contained.

“Nine guineas and twelve shillings,” replied the man. “If that is all,” said the host, “you shall immediately receive the amount: rise, and I will lend you the necessary clothing for the present, and, provided you do not mention this unlucky event, a new pair of breeches shall be procured for you, in place of those lost." After due deliberation with himself, whether it would be right to let such delinquents as the landlord and his domesticks escape, the swindler relented; and all the stipulations being accomplished, he departed, to practise his arts on others; but, failing in his second essay, he was secured, and underwent the punishment prescribed by the law for offences of the above description.
and,

THE POPE, CARDINAL OTTOBONI, AND THE SPECTACLES.

The Cardinal had presented his Holiness with a pair of spectacles on one of the celebrations of his birth-day, which, with the case, cost twenty-five pistoles at Paris. The same dignitary repeating the ceremony in the year 1697, went provided with a new pair, suited to the then state of the sovereign pontiff's eyes, which had witnessed the revolving of eighty-three summers; the former pair laid on a table; Ottoboni took them up, and pretending to fit them to his temples, purposely dropped them; affecting great regret at the accident, he begged permission to repair the loss sustained, and presented the Pope those he had brought with him, richly mounted in gold, and thus inscribed: Mine eyes are always towards the Lord.

The

The Roman wits said upon this occasion, that Ottoboni intended to convey the wishes of the conclave for a speedy evacuation of St. Peter's chair; and that, the Pope having seen too long with French spectacles, the Cardinal had furnished him with a pair, of which one glass was made at Madrid, and the other at Vienna.

SPANISH PUNCTILIO, 1696.

Many ridiculous and whimsical satires have appeared on the above subject since the invention of printing, some of which were founded on facts, and others are evidently fabrications. The Paris papers of 1696 gravely relate the particulars of a dispute on precedence, that terminated in a drawn battle, for what else can be the result, when each party is determined not to recede an inch.

The Queen-mother of Spain died; the officers of the crown and the grandees of the kingdom assembled at the usual time to open her will; but finding that the chief lady of the Queen's chamber, who ought by virtue of her office to have been present, was absent; the august body sent a messenger, requesting her attendance: indignant at so gross an attack upon her privileges and high importance, she replied, it was her indispensable duty not to leave her deceased royal mistress, and therefore the nobles must wait on her.

A dis-

A discussion took place, by messages, which occupied eight hours; in the course of the negotiation, the grandees observed, they insisted on their claims of precedence as an aggregate body, but, individually, they considered themselves happy when complying with the commands of the ladies. Fixed in her resolution, the lady high-chamberlain acquainted her opponents with her final determination; the latter, foreseeing the consequences, proposed, "That without rising from their seats, or moving themselves, they should be carried to a room at an equal distance between their own apartment and the lady high-chamberlain's, who was carried to the same place, seated upon a high cushion, in the same manner as she sat in the Queen's chamber, to the end it might be said—That neither side had made a step to meet each other."

The reader will perhaps agree with me in the supposition, that a dispute of this kind did actually occur; he will have the goodness, however, to believe or disbelieve the termination, at his pleasure.

AVERY, ALIAS BRIDGMAN, THE PIRATE,
 Was a native of Plymouth, and called Long Ben, probably from his having exceeded most of his contemporaries in height. Receiving a commission for an expedition from the Spanish government, vernment, he lay a considerable time at the Groyne, in company with some other vessels; during this interval of leisure, Avery formed the hazardous design of becoming the merciless plunderer of the ships of all nations; and having succeeded in seducing a sufficient number of seamen to navigate the Charles II. of 44 guns, he sailed as her commander, without the least interruption.

In the course of their voyage, they plundered several Swedish and British vessels on their way to or from Newfoundland, and afterwards visited the Portuguese island of Santa May, where Avery provided himself with every necessary by stratagem.

Taking advantage of the total ignorance of his character in the settlement, this subtle pirate invited the governor, his lady, and attendants, to an entertainment on board the Charles II. which they accepted; but, in the midst of their pleasures, the unfortunate representative of his Portuguese Majesty received the unwelcome information that he was expected to supply the ship with provisions and stores, or take the alternative of a trip to the Red Sea. The governor preferred the lesser evil of the two, and sent orders on shore for large quantities of the articles demanded; those were no sooner received, than Avery restored his hostages to their liberty, who were conveyed to their residence, and the former sailed.

On

On his arrival in the Red Sea, he endeavoured to procure information respecting a convoy of the pilgrimage to Mecca. While waiting for this purpose, the pirate discovered two vessels, one of which mounted 70 guns, and had a complement of 1300 men: calculating upon the superior courage and address of his crew, Avery did not hesitate to attack the ship; the Turks defended her with obstinacy for two hours, but had at the close of that period lost all their masts, which compelled them to surrender.

The villains robbed the vessel of precious stones and gold to the amount of £200,000, most inhumanly treated the women on board, and then sent the ship adrift; fortunately for the sufferers, they floated on the coast of India, where the natives hearing that the pirates were Englishmen, attacked the different factories, which were saved from destruction by the prompt protection of the government. Avery returned, and shaped his course for the island of Providence in the West Indies, and bribing the governor with £1000, he shared his booty with his men, who came in parties to England and Ireland by different conveyances.

Upon receiving intelligence to this effect, a reward of £500 was offered by proclamation for apprehending Avery, and proportionate sums for the crew. The following curious lines appeared in in the periodical publications of 1696, which were said to have been written by this arch-pirate, and sent by him to Corunna whence he sailed :

Come all you brave boys, whose courage is bold, Will y' venture with me, and I'll glut you with gold ;

Make haste to Corunna, where a ship you shall find,
Now call'd the Fancy, which will pleasure your mind :

Captain Every is in her, and he calls her his own,
He will box her about before he has done ;
French, Spanish, and Portuguese, and Heathen likewise,

He has made a war with, until that he dies.
Her model's like wax, and she sails like the wind,
She's rigged and fitted, and curiously finn'd,
And has all things convenient for our design ;
God bless his poor Fancy, she's bound for the Mine.

Fair Plymouth farewell, and Catdown be d—n'd,
I once was part owner of most of that land ;
But as I'm dissolv'd, I will abdicate
My person from England, to attend on my fate.
Then away from this frigid, and temperate zone,
'To one that's more torrid you'll find I am gone,
With a hundred and fifty brave sparks of this age,
Who are fully resolv'd their foes to engage ;
Those northern climates are not thrifty to me,
I'll rifle th' Antartick, which some men shall see ;
And

And I am not afraid to let the world know,
 That to the South Seas, and Persia, I'll go ;
 Our names shall be blazed, and spread through the sky,

For a great many places I hope to descry,
 Where never an Englishman yet has been seen,
 Nor any proud Dutchman can say he has been.
 My commission is large, for I made it myself,
 And the capstern will stretch it full larger by half.
 It was dated at Corunna, believe it, my friend,
 From the year Ninety-three, until the world end.
 I honour St. George, and his colours I'll wear,
 And quarter I'll give, but no nation I'll spare :
 The world must assist me in what I do want ;
 And I'll give you my bill, when money grows scant :

But this I do say, and do solemnly swear,
 He that strikes to St. George, the better shall fare;
 But he that refuses, shall suddenly spy
 Strange colours on board of my Fancy to fly,
 Four chevers of gold in a bloody field,
 Environ'd with green, and this is my shield :
 Yet call but for quarter, before you do see
 A bloody flag out, which is our decree,
 No quarters to give, no quarters to take ;
 We save nothing living ; alas ! 'tis too late ;
 For we are all sworn by the bread and the wine ;
 Most serious we are, as any divine.
 Now this is the course I intend for to steer,
 My false-hearted nation, to you I declare,

I have

I have done ye no wrong, thou must me forgive,
For the sword shall maintain me as long as I live.

GENEROUS NATURE OF THE LION.

It seems to be very generally admitted, that this animal possesses a nobleness of mind which prevents him from destroying life, except when provoked to anger, or excited by hunger; and the opinion is corroborated by authors who have had an opportunity of ascertaining the fact, in his native state.

The instance now adduced cannot be said to be a fair criterion to form a judgment on the subject, as the lion in question had endured long confinement, and possibly his spirit was broken through that circumstance, or it might be converted into a species of affection for his keeper, the result of tender treatment. In the month of September, 1696, the person who fed the lions at the Tower of London, performed his customary duty by lowering down the food of one which had a little dog for his companion, to the part of the den appropriated for the purpose, where he supposed the animal proceeded to eat it. A short time afterwards, the man went into the den to feed the dog, and, to his infinite surprise and terror, stumbled over the lion; the generous beast, far from resenting the indignity, suffered the intruder to retire without the least interruption.

ROBBERY AND INEBRIETY.

If the advertisement which closes this article had not removed all doubt respecting the truth of the subject related, the narrative might be considered unworthy of credit. Six highwaymen attacked the Ware coach on Stamford-hill, in the night of November 23d, 1696; and after the customary circle of imprecations, led the horses, vehicle, and passengers under a gibbet, which stood there in terrorem; they then proceeded to rifle each individual, and tore out the breeches-pockets and the skirts from the waistcoats of the gentlemen, to be certain of their contents, which amounted to above an hundred pounds.

At the moment the thieves had completed their intentions, a gentleman's servant passed with a cart; the man was immediately summoned to surrender, which he did without resistance; part of the lading of this prize proved to be several hampers of wine; elated by the success of the evening, the highwaymen opened the hampers, seized the bottles, and emptied many in repeated healths to the owner of the liquid, which expanding the generous natures of the six, they insisted upon the stage-coachman and his passengers solacing themselves for their misfortunes by repeated applications to the favourite beverage of the "Rosy God;" then presenting each with two bottles, they were dismissed on their journey, in a state nearly approaching intoxication.

"A horse-

"A horseman coming by," continues my authority, "they robbed him of his palfrey, but plied him so hot with their liquor that he seemed very little sensible of his loss ; so that stumbling to his inn in his boots, with a bottle in each hand, he made all that he found in the kitchen drink part of his wine, and gave them no small diversion by acting the story, and knocking down several of the company, as the thieves did him."

The person who afforded this diversion to his auditor and spectators on the memorable night of the robbery, appears to have retained much of the good humour produced by the plundered wine when he wrote and sent the ensuing advertisement to the editor of the Flying Post :

"Whereas some gentlemen, of a profession that takes denomination from the king's highway, did borrow a little money of a certain person, near the gibbet at Stamford-hill, without any regard to that venerable monitor, on the 23d of November last, at night; and though they were so generous as to make him drink for his money, yet at the same time they took from him a bright bay nag, about 13 hands high, his mane shorn, thorough-paced, trots a little, with a bridle, saddle, and pilch, without either bargain or promise of payment; he hopes they think his horse worth more than two or three bottles of wine, and therefore desires they would restore him : or if any body can give notice of him to George Poole, at the Blue Last in Islington, ton, so as he may be had again, shall receive ten shillings reward."

M. MOREAU AND THE SIEUR GEOFFROY.

The former of these gentlemen had received the appointment of one of the commissaries of the French army in 1696, and was intimately acquainted with Geoffroy, whom he invited to breakfast with him, on a day which proved most fatal indeed to the two friends. Moreau certainly entertained neither malice nor resentment against his victim; but avarice, equally blind and cruel in its dictates, caused a crime in an instant which years of repentance would never have atoned for. During their conversation at breakfast, Geoffroy mentioned that he possessed bills to the amount of 30,000 livres, and that some of them were drawn upon Moreau; the latter hearing these particulars withdrew, and immediately returned with a pistol and stiletto; the first conveyed a bullet to the unsuspecting guest, and the wretch completed his dreadful purpose by repeated stabs on the body of his old friend.

Assisted by a woman under his influence, Moreau wrapped the deceased in linen, and at night the remains of poor Geoffroy were conveyed to the street of the Vieux Augustines, where the watchman found the body in the morning, and whence it was removed to the Châtelet; being recognized at that place, the Government decreed a handsome some funeral. Moreau, supposing that affected innocence and a bold demeanour would be his best defence against suspicion, actually went to the residence of Geoffroy on the day after he had deprived him of life, and inquiring whether he was at home, the domestick answered, that Mr. G. had caused great apprehensions for his safety by not returning as usual the preceding night, particularly as he had bills on his person to a large amount, which induced his friends to dispatch messengers, forbidding the payment of them till his fate could be ascertained.

Remorse, terror, despair, and the complete disappointment of his avaricious hopes, at once assailed the heart of Moreau; his countenance changed, and his whole frame betrayed so many unequivocal marks of guilt, that he was seized on the very threshold of his victim; and, unable to resist or pervert the dictates of conscience, he confessed his crime, and in due time perished on the wheel.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES IN THE MONTH OF SEPTEMBER.

Mr. Baldwin, who published the Post Man in 1697, entertained his readers, on the 23d of September, with a recapitulation of remarkable and important historical events which had occurred during the month of that name, in various successive cessive years. The subject is evidently from a superstitious source, but not the less curious on that account; it is therefore inserted verbatim from the original. Those who have patience and perseverance may, perhaps, take the hint, and complete the research to the present time; which task is declined by the editor of this collection for no other reason than that of extending the list beyond the limits he has prescribed for each article:

“In the year 1509, such an earthquake happened in September, at Constantinople, that 13,000 men were buried alive. The famous battle of Actium happened on the 2d day of the same month, wherein Augustus got the victory over Antonius, whereby the Roman empire fell into his hands. The 3d day of the same month, Sultan Soliman took Buda, the chief city of Hungary, with the greatest part of that kingdom.

“The same day and month, Rodrigues, king of Spain, was driven out of his kingdom by the Moors. The same day and month, Lewis XII. of France, took the city of Milan, and deprived Lewis Sforce, its duke, of his estate: on the like day, the Emperor Charles V. passed over into Africa, and invaded the kingdom of Algiers. On the 3d of September, 1658, died O. Cromwell, on that very day of the month wherein he gained the the victories of Dunbar in Scotland in 1650, and at Worcester in 1651.

“ The 4th of September, Sultan Soliman, emperor of the Turks, died before Sigeth, taken the 7th day after. The city of Jerusalem was taken about this time of the month of September, by the Romans. The 9th of September, happened the famous battle of Arbela, wherein Alexander the Great overthrew Darius, king of Persia, with his army of 400,000 men. The same day, in the year 1544, James, king of Scots, was slain by the English, and his army overthrown.

“ On the 10th of September, John, duke of Burgundy, was slain by order of Charles VII. which caused great wars throughout all France. On the 7th of September, the Greek Emperors, of the name of Paleologues, took Constantinople, and drove from thence the Earls of Flanders, who had long possessed that empire. The 14th of September, the Switzers received a great overthrow in the expedition of Marignan, and the Turks besieged Vienna with a great army. The 17th of September, happened the famous battle of Poictiers, wherein the French army was overthrown, and King John himself taken prisoner by the English.

“ On the same day of the month, 1515, happened the famous battle of Lepanto, wherein the Christians took or destroyed the whole Turkish fleet; on the same day and month, 1567, Henry, king of Sweden, was dethroned by his rebellious subjects, and cast into prison. The 18th day of September, Bulloign in France was surrendered to the English. Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, the same day of the same month, overthrew a Christian army of 300,000 men; and Saladin took the city of Jerusalem, Pompey having taken it, a long time before, the same day of the same month. Newbury fight happened the 20th of September, 1643.

“The 24th of September, Constantine the Great, in a bloody battle, overcame Maxentius, in the year 333, whence ensued a most remarkable change almost throughout the whole world: in this month Pope Boniface the 8th was taken prisoner, and deprived of the Papal dignity. The 3d of September, the Town Hall of Maydenburg in Germany, with most of the citizens who were dancing therein, was consumed by lightning.

“In September, 465, a fire broke out at Constantinople, by the water-side, which burnt with great violence four days together, and consumed the greatest part of that city, insomuch that, Evagrius saith, the strongest houses were but as dried stubble before it. This famous city of London was also almost consumed by a dreadful fire, which broke out the 2d of September, 1666.

“We read also that many of the greatest princes and monarchs of the world died in September; viz. Augustus, Tiberius, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, mitian, Aurelianus, Theodosius the Great, Valentinian, Gratian, Basilius, Constantine V. Leo IV. Rodolph, Frederick IV. Charles V. all Roman or Greek emperors, with many other famous monarchs; and of the French kings, Pepin, Lewis the younger, Philip III. Charles V. surnamed the Wise, and Lewis his kinsman, king of Hungary and Poland. It is observable that Lothair and Charles the Bald, the one king of France, and the other emperor of Germany, and both sons of Lewis the Devout, both died the 29th of September; the first in the year 855, and the other in 887. So Charles V. and Sultan Soliman, the two greatest emperors that have been for many ages, as they were both born in one year, so both died in the month of September."

CELEBRATION OF A THANKSGIVING DAY AT BRUTON, SOMERSETSHIRE, 1697.

We have many curious and even whimsical instances of popular demonstrations of joy upon record: to those may be added the singular and eccentric suggestions of loyalty, zeal, affection, and the above delightful sensation of the mind, actuating the good people of Bruton, when called upon to commemorate the blessings of the Revolution of 1688, and the return of peace nine years afterwards. A circumstance which rendered the plan adopted particularly capricious was, the inclement season of December, calculated to chill and injure the tender frames of females when carefully guarded by the usual precautions of that period of the year, though on this occasion the ladies seem to have rejected them, trusting alone to the goodness of their cause, as a preservative from the effects of North winds and hoar frosts.
and

The dark and dismal hour of three in the morning was enlivened by the sounds of the church bells; at four the drums beat; and at daylight the armed associations of the town appeared on their parade, under the command of Mr. Richard Welton; at ten they went to the parish-church, where the sermon, preached before them and above one thousand strangers, by a worthy clergyman whose name is not mentioned, was derived from the text, Luke i. verses 74 and 75.

At two o'clock, two hundred married and unmarried females, habited in white, and decorated with gilt laurels, divided into four companies, each led by a she-captain "with rich swashes, with deep gold fringe at the ends, having on a perriwig and hat," made their public appearance, and marched in procession after a band of musick, composed of two drums, three trumpets, three French hautboys, and five violins; their colours were the work of their own fair hands; and two ladies, attended by as many pages, supported a "curious crown, artificially made," as my authority, the Post-Boy, wisely and justly observes. The movements of this cavalcade were so much impeded by the crowd in the streets, though guarded by the gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood, that night had rendered the flags on the Town-hall and Market-cross almost invisible before they were concluded.

Far from being discouraged by the fatigues of the day, the same ladies re-appeared at six o'clock, illuminated by the candles in the windows of the houses, bonfires in the streets, and the more temporary glare of fireworks; besides which, every individual of the two hundred carried a lighted taper, and the four companies were preceded by the same number of wooden lustres, set with considerable numbers of candles. And thus concluded a night remarkable in the annals of Bruton, as we may venture to suppose nothing equally so had occurred there before 1697, or since that period.

DESCRIPTION OF A TURKISH FAST.

Various publications, dated in December 1697, contain the following translation of the reigning Sultan's order on this subject: the editor inserts it without comment, or examination into its authenticity, hoping his readers will use their own discretion, and decide for themselves:

“The Grand Senior of the Turks acknowledges the hand of God upon his dominions, subjects, and kingdoms, forasmuch as the same is so fiercely attacked by its enemies the Christians, so distressed

by sea and land, hath lost so many battles, and such large dominions, in so little a time. He judges this to be come upon him, because he relied too much upon his own great strength, and the alliances that he had made against the Christian emperor. Therefore he ordains and commands, that, in order to appease the anger of God, and of his great prophet Mahomet, on the first Friday of the new moon, as also on the 5th, 6th, and 7th moon, every one shall fast the whole day, till the stars appear in the heavens, and neither eat nor drink. That the Mufti and his servants shall, on those days, clothe themselves with sackcloth, gird themselves with cords, fix their eyes upon the earth, and, with untrimmed beards and lamentable groans, first make a procession in the streets; and then, in the mosques, cry, ‘O wonderful God, O God!’ At Mecca, the coffin of the great prophet shall be taken up, and placed upon a silver stool, with twenty-five other coffins with the bones of his servants that have died a violent death, and Spahis slain in battle, that their prophet may lay their grievous calamity to heart, and pacify the anger of the great God. This shall be performed every Friday; and when the aforesaid coffin shall be placed in the open field, and all the pilgrims, and inhabitants, and strangers, belonging to the caravans, shall go seven times round, weeping and howling, but blow upon no instrument: and on the last day of the fast, there shall be be a procession for twenty miles round, in the following manner: 1. A coffin with dead men's bones, broken scimitars, a bundle of fuzees, broken quivers, carried by 6000 persons clad in sackcloth, and girt with cords, barefoot and bare-headed. 2. Three thousand Mussulmen, sprinkled with blood and ashes, crying, howling, and rending their cloaths. 3. Six thousand people, half-naked, lashing their sides and breasts with thorns, till the blood run down upon the ground, and they are not to stand to wipe it off their bodies. 4. Three thousand Spahis, bare-headed and untrimmed, shall carry the prophet's coffin in procession, round which there are to be 300 Bassas with drawn scimitars, to hew in pieces any man that shall open his eyes to look upon the said coffin, and to throw their corpse to the dogs. 5. At the end of every mile there shall be a Christian and Jewish slave cut down to the ground, and left wallowing in their blood till they die. 6. Thirty Bassas from the provinces, without purple, having on black turbans and a single garment, dipped beforehand in the blood of a Jew and an ass; each of them having one hand tied behind, and no scimitar, but instead thereof a camel's tail dragging upon the ground. 7. Three thousand Janisaries without arms, but long sticks dragging on the ground, crying, 'God, shew us thy mercy!' 8. A chest full of asper-pieces shall follow them, and be strewed upon the ground, but but the poor shall not offer to take them up till the procession be ended, on pain of being run through. 9. The multitude shall close up the rear; and in the midst of them shall walk a hundred Santonis or Hermites, cutting their arms, breasts, and faces with knives, till the blood run down to the ground; and at every mile's end shall hold up their hands, curse the Christians, and cry, 'Enough, God, gracious God!'"

KEEL-HAULING.

A punishment long peculiar to the Navy, but, from its severity, not often inflicted, even on very great offenders against that discipline which preserves system, obedience, and regularity on board of each ship. The Czar Peter the Great, when in England in 1698, visited our men of war, and made inquiries into the nature of the punishments which had contributed to suppress insubordination: the answers he received gave his Majesty much satisfaction, but that of keel-hauling seemed to take his fancy above all others; which a few words of description will demonstrate to have been little improved after his departure from Moscow. The wretched being, sentenced to undergo this horrid ceremony, is secured by two ropes, one of which lets him into the sea; and the other, being passed literally under the ship's keel, serves to drag him beneath it, and to the surface of the opposite side, where a gun is instantly fired over over his head, and he is brought on the deck in a state better imagined than described.

THE FESTIVAL OF ST. IVO AT NAPLES.

The Advocates of Naples are said to have had a custom, at the close of the 17th century, of celebrating their patron saint's anniversary, by a procession, calculated for very different purposes than those of other good Christians who honoured their protectors with real acts of devotion. The wags concerned in this whimsical and satirical ceremony, made choice of one of the most emaciated of their fraternity as Syndic, whom they termed, Interpres Legum sanctissimus; the revered interpreter of the laws had two attendants, habited in the manner of esquires at tournaments: such were the conductors of the cavalcade, composed of advocates, proctors, notaries, solicitors, clerks, servants, boys, &c. Each individual wore a long gown, furred with fox-skin, and the border represented leeches. The place of destination was the Justice-hall, where they had the honour of hearing an oration delivered by the Syndic, in a style equally grave and impressive, which shall be given verbatim from a letter addressed to the editor of the Flying Post "from Naples," detailing the above particulars, and declaring the custom "something like a Terræ Filius in one of our Universities."

The

The Syndic observed, "that though some would say he cackled like a hen upon a roost, he was sure he spoke better than a cow, though his mouth was not half so big: he recommended it to his brethren, to sell their breath at a good rate to their clients, and told them, grinning, what a deal of money the study of the law cost them; especially if they considered what they had been forced to pay for breaking of windows and rails by night, how much they had lost in gaming-houses, and paid to doctors. He gave them a special injunction to be sure to take money for every consultation; and never to refuse giving advice, whether they knew any thing of the matter or not; telling them, with great assurance, that the main design of their practice was to bring gold from Peru. He concluded with a request to them, to reveal the secret to those that were newly matriculated, that they might understand the sweets, the art and mystery of chicanery, when they come together in the temple of Themis, to worship the goddess of Prevarication, and other divinities of the like sort."

PUBLIC SPIRIT OF THE INHABITANTS OF EXETER,

Mr. Dawks gives the succeeding article in his publication, intituled "The Protestant Mercury," of July 21, in the above year. It must be a grateful ful piece of information to the present residents, who were not previously acquainted with the fact:

“ The citizens having shewed their zeal for the public good, in making our river navigable, on Monday last an heroic company of near two hundred women (of the parish of Alphington adjoining) appeared all in white, with clean straw hats, armed with mattocks and shovels, with drums beating, and the city musick playing before them; two grave matrons, with shovels in their hands, leading the van; in the centre, upon a pole, was carried a garland of flowers, with a globe thereon; the rear was also brought up by one of the most considerable persons, with a shovel; in which posture they advanced to the works, the engineer going along with them; and having fixed their standard, they fell to their work with courage, and followed the same diligently till evening, when they returned to the mayor's door, and gave three huzzas; after which, they returned to their own parish, about a mile from hence. Yesterday the gardeners and hatters, to the number of three hundred, marched to the works likewise, with laurels in their hats; and this day, three hundred Grecians, of the parish of St. Sidwells, headed by their parson on horseback, as also the best of the parish in front and rear, with eight drums, two trumpets, and other sorts of musick.”

COFFEE versus BEER.

The ladies of Holland were particularly attached to Coffee previous to and in the year 1700; they met in parties at their different houses, and sipped and talked alternately with infinite satisfaction. The half-animated Dutchman who aspired to the character of a beau or polished gentleman, attracted by the vivacity of this description of society, became insensibly attached to the exhilarating liquid, and gradually neglected the pipe and the brown jug: women in an inferior station of life, always on the alert to arrange themselves in the ranks of fashion, honoured Coffee with their approbation; and the boors who paid their court to them in the inviting arbours and rural shades of the publick drinking-gardens, found the necessity imperious, which compelled them to resign the glass for the china cup.

Coffee concerns remained in this prosperous state for a considerable length of time, and the importers and retailers and grocers rejoiced exceedingly; but as it is decreed by fate that the old proverb, "One man's meat is another man's poison," must ever remain founded on the basis of truth, the Brewers and the Farmers of the excise upon beer languished in the midst of their beverage, which remained unsold and forgotten, except by a certain description of determined toppers

who never proceed out of a regular and systematic track; these worthies, however, were not sufficiently numerous to support a whole trade and the army of excise. The injured party, becoming highly irritated, determined upon actual hostilities with the obtrusive foreign berry, and began their attack by a petition to the States General, in which they represented, that the consumption of beer was so materially lessened, their business barely paid the necessary expences, and that the excise suffered in proportion.

It is said that some of their High Mightinesses observed upon this petition, they thought the country suffered by a culpable indulgence on their parts, and recommended a duty which should prevent the use of coffee by any but the rich; proposing forty florins for a license instead of four then paid; others, dreading domestic dissention, inclined to let things remain as they were, and prevailing, a compromise took place, by which the drinkers were more equally divided between Coffee and Beer.

A PIOUS PAPAL SEIZURE.

The reigning pontiff, in the year 1700, was very aged, very infirm, and, as it happened, very near the termination of his existence; but he was still very keen, as the party concerned with him in this anecdote perceived to his cost. Count Lemberg, ambassador from the court of Austria, intended intended to make a splendid public entry into Rome ; and, amongst other preparations, sent to Paris for a quantity of cloth of gold to cover his coach or coaches. On the arrival of this magnificent cloth, it met with universal commendation, as the most rich and beautiful specimen that had been seen in the former city : those commendations reached the ears of the successor of St. Peter, and he requested to see it ; his wish was instantly gratified ; seized with ungovernable rapture, the good father solemnly blessed the favoured article, which immediately became sanctified, and consequently improper for profane purposes. The Imperial envoy was too good à Catholic to wait for a second hint ; and, making a virtue of necessity, he declared the cloth from that moment the property of our Lady of Loretto. Count Martinitz, his predecessor, had exhibited much stupidity in comprehending and acquiescing in Italian finesse ; but the Pope observed of Lemberg, that he perceived in him a disposition to learn the lesson he had given on the suppression of vanity.

ROYAL GALLIC LOTTERY.

Louis XIV. never committed a more egregious mistake, with reference to his private character, than by promoting a lottery for the relief of the poor of Versailles. A monarch who had expended millions of livres in erecting one of the most superb palaces

palaces in Europe, derived from the labours of his people, and thus in some measure causing their poverty, pretended to relieve it from that very palace in the manner adopted by the Dutch, a frugal people, in every respect unsuited for an example to an absolute prince. Instead of appropriating a portion of the edifice to the purposes of an almonry, whence a liberal stream from an unperceived source might have flowed in an equal current to the indigent, we are led to the antechamber of the Duchess of Burgundy, where we find four clerks employed in preparing tickets to the number of 20,000, and the amiable Louis acquiring the duties of a trustee, to see justice done between the duchess and his people.

On the 16th of March, 1700, the Lieutenant of the Police gave orders for posting the scheme of the lottery on the walls of Paris, which announced the tickets to be valued at a Louis d'Or, the highest prize to be 4,000, and the lowest 50 Louis d'Or.

THE VIRGIN OF THE CHATELET.

A statue of Our Lady, carved in wood, dirty, neglected, and decayed, which stood beneath an arch of the above building, rescued herself from that disgraceful state in the year 1700, and procured a washing, two wax candles to burn before her, and the prayers of numerous faithful persons, by the following simple means, which she knew the populace would consider miraculous, and honour her accordingly. The soldiers stationed at the Chatelet had their attention excited one evening by a person on horseback, whose animal became extremely restive under the arch : one of the men stepped forward, in order to lead the horse ; and, in passing his hand along for that purpose, perceived that he encountered petticoats above and breeches beneath them ; the man, thus disguised, was immediately seized, and, upon further examination, they discovered him to be masked. The Reader must remember, that had not the decaying virgin interfered at the critical minute, the police would have been baffled by a villain, who eluded every thing in his way except the invisible stumbling-block placed under the feet of his horse.

SINGULAR CASE OF ALLAIN ALEXANDER PITOT.

The above A. A. Pitot was a Capuchin Friar, who professed and resided in the monastery of Mans, where he went by the name of Father Eusebius of Guinchamp. Several persons of respectability who had been in France, and afterwards returned to England, declared that Pitot had intimated to them his conversion to the Protestant faith, and ardent wish to escape to this country through their means : they readily consented, and furnished him with cloaths, and other necessities : twice he had deavoured to elude the vigilance of his brethren and the superior, but failed in each attempt; in consequence of which he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment.

In the month of July 1700 he was more fortunate, and succeeded in passing through France, Flanders, and Holland, whence he reached England; and, presenting himself before the vestry of the French church in Threadneedle-street, he declared his determination of abjuring the Roman Catholick, and adopting their faith. After due examination, the gentlemen of that body were convinced of the truth of his statements, and resolved that they would permit him to make a public recantation in the church on the 8th of September.

During the interval between the 11th of August and the above date, M. Pitot lodged at M. Fontaine's, in Spital-fields, who had a female servant zealously attached to the religion Pitot meant to reject; but that fact was unknown to the family: this person, hearing of the intended ceremony, thought proper to communicate the information to the chaplain of a foreign minister, who called at Fontaine's, and requested to see the convert, which he had no sooner done than he expressed great pleasure, and enquired of Pitot whether he did not recollect Father Emanuel, whom he had known at Rennes, and who had set him the example, by becoming a proselyte to the Protestant communion. Pitot, recovering his ideas from the confusion caused by so unexpected a visit, remembered he had actually seen this person at the place just mentioned; and, feeling deeply his present situation, blessed heaven that they had met under circumstances so very auspicious.

Father Emanuel made many minute enquiries as to the manner of his escape, and, after further conversation, invited him to go to a Coffee-house, where they might enter into the subject of Pitot's conversion without restraint; accordingly they went together to a place at a considerable distance, where Emanuel discovered that their refreshments were indifferent, and proposed another, still more remote from Spital-fields, which Pitot was unable to name, as he knew none of the streets of London. It was four o'clock when they left the house they first visited; and the evening fast approaching, M. Pitot requested to be conducted home: at that moment Emanuel contrived to introduce another proselyte, and by these means night had arrived ere the confederates consented to accompany their dupe to his lodgings. Instead of performing their promise, they led Pitot to a large mansion, which was afterwards found to be that of an ambassador whose name is not mentioned; they entered an apartment on the left-hand, where Father Emanuel assumed the austerity of a monk, and pronounced himself to be a capuchin, armed with the powers of a Missionary from the holy see; a Franciscan soon afterwards joined them, and, uniting their voices, they loudly reproached Pitot with his apostacy, at the same time declaring that they would make his peace if he would consent to sign certain propositions, and perhaps obtain for him a Chaplaincy to some Foreign Minister, with a liberal pension.

Near three hours were passed in severe contention, when the missionaries conducted Pitot up and down flights of stairs, who thought the apartment which was the termination of his excursion the same he had left, as it contained a bed with green furniture, on which he reposed during the remainder of the night. On the following morning he was taken to a room communicating with a chapel, whence he saw five masses celebrated by the same number of priests, who administered the host to several persons: after the conclusion of the service, his conductors led him to the room he had before occupied, where he dined, and, being left alone, he contrived to open the locks which detained him a prisoner, and, after some difficulty, he reached his lodgings.

When the family of M. Fontaine missed their inmate, some circumstances induced them to suspect the servant, who, upon being sharply interrogated and terrified, confessed she had been instrumental in his detention; and, consenting to con-conduct her master, and three other persons, to the place, she led them to the house already mentioned, where she immediately claimed and obtained the minister's protection who resided in it. As a further proof of the fact, M. Pitot's friends caused him to be conveyed to different parts of the city, and finally to the house in question, which he immediately recognized.

The party implicated endeavoured to invalidate the monk's testimony by the following statement; that he was neither decoyed or deceived, as he went voluntarily to the house of the minister, and offered to continue in the faith of his forefathers, provided he might be absolved from his monastic vows, and act for the future as a secular priest. This proposal being rejected by the missionaries, he left them, and went to a public-house in the neighbourhood, where he slept; and a person made oath that he was in Pitot's company, and actually let him out the next morning through a back door: in addition to which, others declared he did not remain at the Envoy's residence. "The Postman" observed upon this occasion, the "affair has appeared so material that the Government has taken notice thereof; and no doubt will provide, in their great wisdom, against future attempts of the like nature; and rather the more, because not long ago a Spanish proselyte, who had been a Carmelite Friar, and proved a man of good morals and principles, vanished away, away, being doubtless taken up by missionaries, and likely carried away into Spain; for several advices from thence told us of a man being burnt alive for deserting the church, and the picture they made of that martyr was very like our Carmelite."

On the 14th of September the servant girl was apprehended, and committed for trial; and, on the following day, Mons. Pitot made a solemn renunciation of the Roman Catholic religion in the French church already mentioned, UNCOMMON INSTANCE OF MATERNAL INFAMY.

The judicial court of Holland pronounced judgment on an affair, in October 1700, which surpasses almost every instance of turpitude upon record, except in the solitary cases to be found in our State Trials. Madam Noortwyk, a lady of fortune, and of the most respectable connections, had a daughter who unfortunately excited the admiration of a rich Jew. We are not told whether the young lady felt a similar regard for the Israelite; but, however that may have been, the mother arranged a bargain with the gentleman, who agreed to give her 33,000 florins as the price of the former. The parties were not sufficiently guarded in their conduct to prevent this infamous contract from being known: the public voice was loud in execrating it, and Madam Noortwyk's relations most honourably consigned her her to unobstructed justice. The sentence of the court was severe, but not cruel ; though the case almost warranted some of the corporeal inflictions of the law. Madam Noortwyk was imprisoned for life, forfeited the detestable bond (for the Jew took care not to pay in money), and paid a fine of 66,000 florins. Guardians were appointed for the daughter ; the punishment of her purchaser is not mentioned.

GENERAL VIEW OF POLITICAL EVENTS DURING THE XVIIITH CENTURY.

This article appeared in the Postman of December 31, 1700. The masterly manner in which it is written compels us to regret its brevity. The author calls it an iron age ; feelingly laments the waste of human life, and that the earth had become a field of blood ; concluding, the then generation had reason to dread the succeeding century as likely to be even worse than the former. Little did he imagine the Commonwealth of England would have been imitated eighty-nine years after he wrote by a ferocious set of people, who wasted more blood in one month than the English did in twelve years, by attempting to establish a phantom, while they were, in reality, forging the heaviest chains of despotism for themselves, for the rest of Europe, and even South America, where the dæmon of revolution now stalks abroad, surrounded by scenes of carnage, only

only surpassed by those exhibited in France, Austria, Prussia, Poland, Russia, Holland, and Denmark. In the first of those countries more fell by the guillotine, and the hands of their countrymen, than the survivors dare enumerate; and in the remainder instances might be cited when vast armies perished in a day, and the fate of kingdoms was repeatedly decided by a single battle. Let it not then be pronounced that the 19th can be more detestable than the 18th century; and surely no one will contend that the last twenty years of it did not present a more dreadful picture than the one hundred of the 17th.

“This being the last day of the year 1700, which concludes the XVIIth century, it will not be improper to present the Reader with a short epitome of the most material things that have been transacted during the same, that he may, in some manner, foresee what is like to happen in the following.

“The XVIIth century has been justly called, from its very beginning, the Iron Age; for though the former have been very lewd and dissolute, this has certainly exceeded in all manner of wickedness; Virtue, Sincerity, and Justice, have been scared from the world; Christendom has been a continual Aeldema, a field of blood, a theatre of ravage, cruelties, and destruction; and Piety and Religion have received such mortal wounds, wounds, that there is reason to fear that they will not recover their first splendor, till Righteousness comes to inhabit the new earth, promised in the Holy Writings.

“The narrow bounds of this paper does not permit that we should enlarge upon any subject, and therefore we must come to the epitome we have promised.

“The most material thing we find in the beginning of this century, is the Union of the crowns of England and Scotland, in the person of king James the First, who succeeded the renowned queen Elizabeth, the glory of her sex, and the ornament of her age, March 24, 1602. This Union put an end to the feuds and quarrels which had so long subsisted between the two nations, and might have been much more improved to their common advantage, had true politics and justice prevailed over malice, pride, and envy.

“France mourned, soon after, the death of king Henry the Fourth, basely murdered in his own coach in the middle of his capital city, by a bloody villain, who, by a world of circumstances, which in any other case would have been deemed as a full proof, appeared to have been put upon that execrable design by the Jesuits. Strange! that the French nation, after having seen two of their kings successively murdered by priests and friars, should be led by the nose by that very gang; and that the son and grandson of that very prince should, should, in compliance to the successors of his murderers, ruin and waste their flourishing kingdom. The minority of Lewis the XIIIth was attended with great commotions, and the whole reign of that prince either with foreign or civil wars. The French, in conjunction with their allies, the king of Sweden, the States of Holland, and the Protestant princes of Germany, made indeed some conquests abroad; but Lewis, though surnamed the Just, out of a popish zeal, destroyed thrice as many towns in his own kingdom, as his generals took from his neighbours by their victorious arms. The reader must not expect any particulars of those famous wars in Germany; the single triumphs of Gustavus Adolphus would make a large volume. I will observe only, that they ended at last by the treaty of Munster, 1648, the most honourable and advantageous that ever was yet transacted for the Protestants. The Swedes, and other Protestant princes, got large principalities; their religion was declared one of the religions of the Empire, and the liberty of conscience therein established; and the Republic of Holland, which was founded in the last century by the wisdom of the great William of Nassau, prince of Orange, and defended by the great conduct and courage of Maurice and Frederick-Henry his worthy sons, was owned by Spain for a free and independent state. England contributed very little to that famous treaty, though the Elector Palatine, son-in-law to king James the First, had been the chief occasion of all those wars, upon account of his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and had lost both his new kingdom and patrimonial dignity. King James was too pacific to break with the Spaniards; and king Charles the First was so unfortunate in his reign that he was not able to assist his brother-in-law, whose family was restored by the treaty of Munster to part of his state, and to the Electoral Dignity, by the creation of an eighth Electorate.

“ While the house of Austria were so busy in Germany, there happened two things in Spain which caused great convulsions in that kingdom, I mean the insurrection of Catalonia and Portugal. It is true, the Catalans were some time after reduced; but Portugal, which since the year 1580 had been a province of Spain, has continued from 1640 to this day a separate kingdom; but whether they are like to continue so very long, let the Portuguese themselves look to it.

“ The Civil Wars in England, which began much about that time, afforded some particulars which are not to be paralleled in any age: and I am yet to learn, that any nation ever saw its own king publicly beheaded before his own palace by colour of law, by sentence of a pretended court of justice. By that fatal blow Monarchy was totally eclipsed; and then broke out a Commonwealth, which, like a blazing star, after having amazed the

the world, and influenced all the councils of Europe, vanished; and a new sort of government made way for the restoration of the Royal Family. The return of our Princes promised a golden age; but it appeared soon after that they had sucked in some principles abroad, inconsistent with the English constitution; and that contrariety produced such commotions and councils, as would totally have subverted our lawful government, our liberties, and religion, and introduced popery and arbitrary power, had not God Almighty raised a Prince of Orange for our delivery, who, after the abdication of the late king James, was proclaimed, with his royal consort the late queen Mary, king and queen of England, under whose auspicious reign our liberties have been more firmly established than before.

“Death has deprived us of one of them; and what endeavours hell and wicked men have done to deprive us of the other, all the world sufficiently knows: witness Granval’s conspiracy in Flanders, and the late intended assassination. These were not designs of melancholy persons, but abominable projects, approved and supported by men of the highest rank in the world. God has confounded those wicked designs, and that he would preserve the life of his Majesty, on which the safety of Europe depends, ought to be the constant prayers of all good men.

“The

“The restoration of king Charles, and the Pyrenean treaty between France and Spain, promised a long peace; but, notwithstanding the solemn renunciation made by the Infanta, and ratified by the French king, of all her pretensions to the succession of her mother and father, the French attacked the Spanish Netherlands in the year 1666, to assert the title of their queen to some territories belonging to Spain, and the French lawyers laughed at the renunciation of her Majesty, as insignificant, and not to be taken notice of. The triple alliance between England, Sweden, and Holland, put a stop to their progress; but France knowing the weak side of king Charles, they brought him off of that treaty, and engaged him in the most fatal design that ever an English king could be guilty of; I mean, to instruct them in the art of building ships and navigation, and wear out his own naval power against Holland, whose interests are so linked with England, that, notwithstanding what some hirelings give out at this time, it is impossible one should stand if the other falls. The nation was soon sensible of the mistake; and though Holland was by our union with France brought within an ace of their ruin, we made a separate peace with them; and the unparalleled conduct of the young prince of Orange saved his native country, and at last the peace of Nimeguen was concluded by the mediation of England in 1679, whereby the French

French got nothing from the Dutch, but large countries from the Spaniards.

“ The ambition of France did not stop there; for they seized Luxemburg and Strasburg, upon account of certain dependencies, and forced Europe to confirm their usurpation by the truce of 20 years, concluded anew 1684. This did not satisfy that crown, for in the year 1688, the Dauphin took Philipsburg, and destroyed the Palatinate, and occasioned a general war in Europe, in which England being concerned, they turned the scale, and the great prudence of his Majesty forced France to sue for peace, which was concluded at Ryswick, September 10, 1697, and thereby France restored large territories both to the Spaniards and the Empire.

“ Nothing having occurred since, except the treaty of Carlowitz, we come to the chief transactions of this year, which will be as famous in our annals as any; for we have therein the war and peace of Holstein, so glorious to England, Sweden, and Holland; the invasion of Livonia by the king of Poland, and the czar of Muscovy, the unsuccessful siege of Riga by the former, the defeat of an army of 100,000 Muscovites by the young king of Sweden, who, with a handful of men, and at the age of 18 years, has gained more glory in one campaign, than some other princes have done with numerous armies in the course of a long reign. This year has likewise produced a new kingdom kingdom of Prussia, erected in favour of the elector of Brandenburg; a new Pope, and a new scene of affairs by the death of the late king of Spain, and the accession of the duke of Anjou to that monarchy. Europe has feared for about thirty years the sad effects of the death of that prince, and his Majesty and the States of Holland, always zealous for preserving the peace, had, as mediators, proposed some terms for settling that succession, to the satisfaction of all parties. France accepted of them, and entered into the famous treaty of partition; and her ministers and ours, with the Dutch, solicited all the Courts of Europe to enter into the same. The emperor and others did not think fit to accept it; and now the late king of Spain having appointed the duke of Anjou his universal heir, the French have thought fit to accept his will, without sticking religiously to the conditions of the treaty with their allies, especially as to the two months time, which were to be given to the emperor. They tell us, that they did so only for preserving peace, but I remember that the siege of Philipsburg in time of peace 1688, was coloured with the same pretence.

“What will be the consequences of this affair, God knows; but whosoever considers what mischiefs the union of the empire and Spain in the house of Austria has done the world, must, upon several accounts not to be mentioned here, expect greater calamities from the union of France and Spain in the house of Bourbon.

“Popery

“ Popery has still been more cruel this century than the last. The gun-powder plot, the massacre in Ireland, wherein above 200,000 persons were murdered, the massacre in the valleys of Piedmont, and the horrid persecutions in Hungary, Silesia, the Palatinate, and chiefly in France, are instances not paralleled with a former age.

“ To conclude this discourse, I think that whosoever will be at the pains to consider the present juncture of affairs, the dispositions of mankind, and the little regard they have for solemn treaties and oaths, will find sufficient cause to fear, that the next age will be still worse than the former, and conclude with Horace,

Damnosa quid non imminuit dies?

Ætas parentum pejor avis tulit

Nos nequiores, mox daturos

Progeniem vitiosiore.”

SINGULAR DISCOVERY OF A PLOT.

It is said, in the publications of the close of the year 1700, that Groningen had a narrow escape from being delivered by treachery into the possession of the bishop of Munster, which was prevented by the following accident: A person of some importance in the place, and a rigid catholic, had been writing in his private apartment, whence he was suddenly and unexpectedly summoned on particularly pressing business; he inadvertently left the door open, and immediately after his son, then very young, entered; the child, observing papers lying on the table, seized the first that came to hand, and carried them with him to school, where the master's attention was attracted by the circumstance, who thought proper to examine them, as they appeared to be in the form of intended letters. One was addressed to the bishop, informing him that the town was in a state of fancied security, and proportionably unprovided with the means of defence, that the Protestant burgomasters, suspecting nothing evil against them, might be dispatched without difficulty or opposition, and suggesting other propositions tending to the same point. The schoolmaster, sensible of the importance of the discovery, went immediately to the magistrates, and communicated his intelligence, who sent officers of justice to apprehend the offender; but he had escaped beyond a possibility of detection; and they were reduced to the unpleasant uncertainty of forming conjectures, whether this plan originated with the person implicated, or whether it was part of an extensive plot. However, their precautions, or some other cause, prevented the publick tranquillity from being further disturbed.

DEATH OF JAMES II.

We are indebted to the Editor of the Postman of October 30, 1701, for the following translation of a Latin speech pronounced by the Pope, in a Con-

Consistory held at Rome on the third of October in the above year. The feeling manner in which the Pontiff expressed himself on announcing the death of his spiritual son, shews the strong necessity that produced the Revolution of 1688.

“ Venerable Brethren, We impart to you with tears and sighs the most sad and doleful death of James king of Great Britain, of illustrious memory, which we could not hear of without feeling in our paternal heart a most grievous affliction ; and we cannot doubt but you will be affected with the same grief for the great loss the Christian commonwealth has sustained in the death of a truly catholick prince, a true son of the church, and a true defender of the faith ; which we do sadly lament at this time. But as we are not to sorrow, according to the advice of the apostle, for such who sleep, as others that have no hope, the great piety of the deceased King, which no time shall blot out, and which shall be remembered to the latest posterity ; his heroic contempt of all human things for the Orthodox Religion, so well known to all the world, which that excellent prince preferred to his country, riches, kingdom, and even his life ; and lastly, his constant and most religious death, as we are informed by noble testimonies, give us just grounds to hope, that as God has been pleased to try him during his life as gold in a crucible, so he has received him after his death as an acceptable sacrifice.

However, charity does not permit us to be wanting in our prayers to God Almighty for the Soul of a prince who has so well deserved of the apostolick see ; and as we have not neglected to do it already in private, so we shall in a due time do it publickly by funeral solemnities in our pontifical chapel, according to the example of the Roman pontiffs our predecessors.

“ Moreover, we cannot on this occasion be silent, and forbear to take notice of the great virtue of our most dear son in Christ Lewis, the Most Christian King of France (so worthy of his royal soul), who having received with all magnificence and liberality the said king James vilanously dispossessed of his kingdom, with his royal consort and his son, and given them to the last all possible proofs of humanity and tenderness, has still, which is more great and noble, continued the same affection to his surviving son, so carefully brought up by our most dear daughter in Christ, queen Mary his mother, that he may imitate or exceed the virtues of his father, and entirely neglecting his own private interests, has publickly owned him for heir of the Britannick empire, and has thereby nobly confirmed him in his resolution of professing and asserting the Catholick Faith, to what fortune soever he may be reduced. The zeal of the most Christian King, and the greatness of his soul, do so conspicuously shine in this thing, that he justly deserves from us and from you

you the praise and encomium which our posterity will pay him, whenever they call to remembrance that noble action, which will never be forgotten.

“ Though we believe that you have been informed of these things, yet having lately received a particular account thereof, by an express from our venerable brother Philip Anthony archbishop of Athens, our nuntio to the most Christian King, who has been an eye-witness of all those things, and has carefully examined them, we have thought fit to acquaint you with the same in this place, that they may be recorded to another posterity, and afford a new proof of our affection for you.

“ We hope and assure ourselves, Venerable Brethren, that you, by your powerful assistance and prayers, will ease the great burthen put upon us, notwithstanding our weakness, which we daily experience more heavy in these times of troubles and affliction.”

THE ARCH-DUKE CHARLES OF AUSTRIA.

This prince strongly excited the attention of Europe in the reign of queen Anne, who, in common with other sovereigns of the continent, endeavoured to preserve the balance of power, which for many ages prevented the shameful state of degradation we have witnessed by the accomplishment of those projects which Lewis XIV. commenced, and France has recently completed. Lewis, by placing a branch of his own family on the throne of Spain, calculated upon the complete controul of the military power of that country. England, Austria, the principal part of the German circles, Holland, &c. dreading the preponderance of France, thought themselves more secure in attempting to obtain the crown of Spain for the archduke Charles: accordingly the Emperor made a formal renunciation of the Spanish dominions to that prince; and the States General, in conjunction with England, sent a fleet to Portugal and Spain, to ascertain whether the people of the latter were inclined to accept the new monarch. On the 12th of September, 1703, the Emperor caused the Archduke to be proclaimed King of Spain at Vienna, by the title of Charles III. and it was concerted by the allies that he should proceed through Holland, England, and Portugal, for the place of his destination.

It is far from the intention of the compiler of these Anecdotes to relate the political occurrences of that busy period, when England obtained so much military glory; it will be sufficient for him to rescue from oblivion some of the effects produced on the minds of the British publick, by the exertions of the government in this cause, which certainly met with very general approbation, expressed in a variety of verses, inscriptions, and essays. A chronosticon made upon the occasion, will will illustrate the mental fatigue and ingenuity of some unknown individual.

“Scurrilous libels (says the author of the life and reign of Queen Anne) abounded at this time, reflecting on the conduct of the House of Commons; but none were more scurrilous than those of John Tutchin, the writer of a newspaper called the Observer.” The Observer alluded to, appeared thrice a week, and consisted of a supposed dialogue between the Observer and a Countryman. It may be imagined so remarkable a circumstance as the arrival of Charles III. produced a conversation, part of which is as follows:

“Countryman. I have got rare news; the King of Spain is arrived, and gone to Windsor to wait on my Queen, who is his mother by adoption, as are all the confederated powers against France
her

her children. It is a great honour to our nation that our Queen makes so considerable a figure in Europe ; that her name, like that of the mighty William's, is borne on the wings of fame to the utmost confines of the terrestrial globe. So great a Queen, and so potent a people, are not only the wonder, but the terror of those kingdoms and states that are so unhappy as not to be in alliance with them. And much more glorious would the crown and realm of England be, were we once freed from those vermin papists, high-flyers, and non-jurors, who all centre in the common name of Perkinites."

The Countryman then proceeds to say that he met with many of "those wretches" at a coffee-house, who amused themselves by ridiculing Charles III. and his pretensions ; disgusted with their manners, this coadjutor of the Observator went to a tavern, where he found "a parcel of red hot first-rate Englishmen" drinking the Queen's health, the Protestant succession, the church of England, toleration, and the king of Spain ; which, he remarks to his friend, he could swallow "without kecking:" some of the company at length discovering his connection with the Observator, he was unanimously called upon to compose some heroic lines on the King's arrival ; "whereupon" he delicately adds "I scribbled down the following ballad with as much ease as Rabbi Bunyan wrote his verses, or Parson Smut talks nonsense ; and whether they liked it or no I don't care one farthing.

"From

“ From foreign shores the youthful Monarch’s come;

And with him bears the fate of France and Rome:
Loud hurricanes and tempests clear’d the air,
And first proclaim’d the mighty Prince of war;
The roaring winds, which thro’ the Æther flew,
Foretold that peals of thunder would ensue.

When Hercules deceas’d on Oata’s top,
Imperial Jove large pines and oaks did lop;
With whirlwinds he the lofty woods did spoil,
And rob’d the groves to make his funeral pile;
Meteors and comets fill the azure skies,
When some great Prince is born, or some great Monarch dies.

“ Cease now ye winds, no more such roarings keep;

Let all ill-natur’d storms be hush’d asleep,
And Halcyons brood upon the silent deep.

The Ocean’s burden is Britannia’s care,
On him depends the dire event of war:
He, like the sun, must ’livening rays dispense,
And distant armies, by his influence,
Must move and act, for his success must wait;
For he determines Spain’s and Europe’s fate.

“ Rous’d by report of fame, and stories told,
How England’s Queen gave laws in times of old
To neighbouring lands, and rul’d the spacious sea,
While trembling nations did her laws obey;
He comes to see the Queen, whose mighty name
So much extends the spacious mouth of fame;

To

To hear her wisdom, and to learn of her
How he must govern in another sphere.

“Go, mighty Monarch, to thy kingdoms go,
And be thy land’s palladium from the foe!
May rough Biscaia’s waves, which rise and swell,
At thy approach be calm, and smooth, and still;
May Spaniards, conscious of thy worth, prepare
To meet with joy their lawful Prince from far;
And like the Britons cover all the Strand,
When glorious William to their aid did land:
May every post, and each dispatch’t express,
Bring joyful tidings of this good success!”

Another paper was published at the same period, termed Heraclitus Ridens, which the author intended as an express antidote to the Observer. I have no proof that the government supported this paper, but it is probable that such was the fact. The manner in which the laughing philosopher commented on the countryman’s heroick lines will possibly afford my readers equal amusement with the lines themselves. The dialogue in the instance now before us is between the imaginary characters of Jest and Earnest.

“Earn. I have a piece of intricacy for you too, a poetical enigma; I mean the Countryman’s verses in Nob’s last; prithee let me into the meaning of ’em.

“Jest. He has been plundering Sir Palmer Fairbone’s epitaph in Westminster Abbey for one, which is this;

‘And

‘And be the town’s palladium from the foe.’
 Most of the rest are of the same complexion, picked up here and there, though some may be found to be his own from the genuine dullness that abounds in them. In exchange for his, I will give you a fable of my own, which for all that I know, may be justly enough animadverted upon; but the reader will conclude with me, that they are not stolen.

“A Lion yielding to his fate,
 Like other beasts of princely state,
 That o’er the forest reign;
 Two of his kindred brought their claim,
 Of different right, and different name,
 And would those claims maintain.

The first from all his subjects’ voice,
 And from a testimonial choice
 His high pretensions made;
 The second of the Lion’s kind,
 From ties of blood, and oaths that bind,
 In form his caveat laid.

When spite of what his Sires had done,
 The first a gallant of a son,
 Leap’d to the throne in haste.
 And having seized the regal goods,
 Whether on hills, or plains, or woods,
 Was in possession plac’d.

Whereas

Whereas the last, unus'd to force,
 And thinking all his own of course,
 Sat silently at home ;
 And still his journey had delay'd,
 By fond, indulgent parents staid,
 In spite of Lybia's doom.

Lybia, that destin'd seem'd to be,
 O'errun with fraud and treachery,
 Till neighb'ring powers awak'd,
 And summon'd all their arts and sense,
 Their treasures, in the Youth's defence,
 And for him kingdoms shak'd.

Nobly attended, forth he came,
 In search of Empire and of fame,
 And nobly was accosted.

As entertain'd with feasts and sports,
 He to his own through foreign courts
 Without obstruction posted.

When at Sydonian plains arriv'd,
 By Sydon's Lioness reviv'd,
 All rapture and surprize ;
 He stood amaz'd at what he'd seen,
 Such flowing plenty, such a Queen,
 And scarce believ'd his eyes.

Till forwards from among the crowd,
 A senseless monkey, poor and proud,
 His Majesty address'd ;

And

And cry'd, ' upon a monkey's word,
 You are your people's Sovereign Lord,
 There's none but will confess't.

Look on my Queen, she'll vindicate,
 And with the forces of her state,
 Conduct you to your throne:
 I have for prophecies been tried,
 And since I've written on your side,
 Your crowns are all your own.'

' What pity 'tis a Queen so good,
 Of such illustrious worth and blood,'
 The Prince, concern'd, reply'd, Should suffer such an apish fool,
 Her government to ridicule
 With insolence and pride.'

Apes, we like apes should always use,
 The scum, the scandal, and refuse
 Of all the whole creation;
 Not suffer such a slave to cry,
 Without rebuke, my Queen and I,
 When he'd pervert the nation.

MORAL.

That none of what's due to 'em this fable may rob,
 The monkey's the perfect resemblance of Nob."

If the compiler is not greatly mistaken Tutchin the Observator carried his animadversions to such a length as to excite a most dreadful and totally unjustifiable

unjustifiable private vengeance; in short, some persons thoroughly exasperated entered his apartments at a moment when he was alone writing, and beat him so severely as ultimately to cause his death. The extravagance to which party and obstinacy led Mr. Tutchin will appear in the extract now offered from his 97th number, vol. II. "But I tell thee, I am ready to answer in court to any indictment, where I expect to have fair play (and not to be condemned without being heard), which will be the practice of our courts of justice, as long as the present judges are in being; and if they are succeeded by the race of Jefferies and Jenner, I can but go into another country; I have been taught the way already.

"Countryman. I have heard folks say, when a man comes upon his trial, in some cases he has the liberty to except against some of his jurymen. Now if your case admits of this practise, I would have you except against one particular person that puts himself forward to be on your jury.

"Observer. Prithee, who's that?

"Countryman. 'Tis a great paunch-bellied fellow, that lives in the Strand, within two miles of Strand-bridge. He was upon—I don't know how many juries, in those reigns when they hang'd the Whigs at such a confounded rate; he suck'd their blood like a horse-leach. In king William's reign he repented, by getting himself himself on the juries, by hanging the Papists and Tories; and now, in this reign, he has repented like a dog in a wheel, and is turned a Perkinite. About Trinity-term was a twelve-month he was convicted of a kidnapping at Westminster, and was fined 100 marks; he was lately bail for one of the conspirators; and yet I am told he is a justice of P— for the county of H—. Pray have a care of this monster.”

The next paragraph explains the allusion in these words, “the kidnapper in the Strand is Fuller every way.” “The present judges,” who condemned without hearing the defendant, were Lord Chief Justice Holt and his brethren. It is singular that other authors say, “The law and justice were never administered with more effect than when he presided in the King’s-bench.” Indeed it is related of him, that he set the House of Peers at defiance when he thought some of their decisions were unjust and contrary to law; nor was he more gentle with the Speaker of the House of Commons, and a deputation from that body who visited him in the Court of King’s-bench, to demand his reasons for a judgement he had given. “I sit here to administer justice,” said Holt, “if you had the whole House of Commons in your belly I should disregard you; and if you do not immediately retire, I will commit you, Mr. Speaker, and those with you.”

Far

Far be it from the compiler to decide between Mr. Tutchin, Lord Chief Justice Holt, and Mr. Fuller; he is contented by stating both sides of the question, and shall conclude this article by some very tolerable lines from Heraclitus Ricens, which ought not to be totally forgotten in a popular government, though written by the friend of queen Anne's ministers of 1703.

“ Once on a time the beasts together drew,
 Summon'd to meet upon a grand review,
 Each to declare if injur'd or oppress'd,
 And have their injuries and wrongs redress'd.
 The lion, fix'd and seated on the throne,
 Heard all their grievances distinctly shewn,
 Distributing rewards, and special grace
 To such as did the duties of their place;
 And punishments to such as broke their trust,
 To merits and demerits strictly just.

“ When from the rest a grumbling bear arose,
 And thus impeach'd his sovereign's friends for foes:
 Please you, my liege, for justice I entreat,
 Grant me the gracious gift from mercy's seat;
 Those officers of state that near you stand
 Pinch the revenues, and distress the land;
 They for themselves, not you, the laws dispense,
 And are as void of honesty as sense;
 The panther there and leopard should be try'd,
 You'll ne'er do well till they are set aside;
 Till this your ministry is purg'd anew,
 And such as I our great endowments shew.

“ Hold,

“ Hold, said the royal brute, thy counsels spare,
 And from advising sovereigns forbear ;
 Know, beasts of prey, and of ungenerous mind,
 Bears will be bears, a discontented kind,
 In place uneasy, out of office bold,
 And reaching for the reins they cannot hold ;
 Hadst thou but prais’d these worthies thou hast blam’d,
 Doubtless I should their service have disclaim’d ;
 But vain ’s thy prayer, or sinister thy ends,
 For foes to bears must needs be lions friends.”

THE PROPHECIES OF NOSTRODAMUS.

Nothing can be more absurd than the attempts repeatedly made to apply the wild extravagancies of this Seer to passing events. With all the ingenuity of credulity, and the eagerness of self-conviction, we find time silently contradicting the dupes of Nostrodamus. Thus a wiseacre who lived in the reign of queen Anne gave us to understand, in the London Post, that he would not pretend to determine whether the gift of prophecy had then altogether ceased, but as the first cause is eternal, it was possible it had not. The number of pious and learned men who, since the days of the Apostles, were blessed with the spirit of penetrating the mysteries of the great signs of the times were too numerous for him to particularize ; he therefore only mentions the name of bishop Usher, which he relied upon as equal to any arguments or facts he could adduce on the subject.

The prophetic lines quoted by him, he adds, were written 800 years before 1704, originally in Latin, and afterwards translated, by a French priest, into his native language. Those he considered as highly important, strictly applicable to the then state of affairs in France, Spain, and the Empire, and actually within two years of their final and undoubted accomplishment by the downfall of Lewis XIV. in 1705. Fortunately for our believer he was only ten years short in his calculation, and as Lewis died in 1715, he had the consolation of knowing that a V occurred in the numerals of that year ; unluckily for him, on the other hand, the Allies did by no means succeed in their wishes, as Philip, the grandson of Lewis, kept the crown of Spain ; and the latter, though not as prosperous as he hoped to be, departed peaceably from the world, at an advanced period of life.

“ PROPHECIE.

“ Poor France, by hollow-hearted priests from Rome,

A thousand miseries to thee shal come :

Thy innocents, for doeing what they ought,

Like shepe unto the slaughter shal be broughte.

But from First Henries predecessours reigne,

Thy seaventh King shal conquer'd be, or tane ;

Till

Till one arise more haughtie and lesse good,
 To make hys subjects made a sea of blood :
 Then France look out, for loe beyonde the Rhyne,
 A myghtie hoaste with myghtie hoastes will joyne.
 Thy downefall is within thy selfe to bee,
 Assisted by a myghtie flete at sea :
 All will bee faithfull to oppose thy pride,
 And truth, when V appeares, shal conquerour ride.
 More heads will bee adorned with a crowne,
 And Papacie will Papacie pull downe.
 One kingdome shal to save another stand,
 And one shal lose a myghtie tracte of land.
 A neighbouring prince will make so much to doe,
 That all the worlde will thinke him honest to.
 'Tis all but tricke, or els I'm much deceevd,
 And is too open not to be believ'd.
 But have a care when onse you seize your own,
 Of promis'd favour, when no favour's showne :
 Then will the Goolden Age begin to bloome,
 And loe the tyrante shal receive hys doome.
 When V appeares, and trees ther leaues do shede,
 All will rejoyce to heare the wretche is deade."

"Now, what will become of this present Lewis God only knows : but sure I am, nothing remains to accomplish this prophecy but the downfall of the persecutor of his people. It is first fulfilled in the jesuits and monks imposing on the consciences of his subjects : how many thousands have been put to death, fined, imprisoned, banished, and committed to the gallies, through their means, let the poor Waldenses and Cevennois speak? And this I take to be the sea of blood (says he) through which his subjects have waded.

“ Then France, look quick about, beyond the Rhine,

A mighty host with mighty hosts will join.

“ This I take to be a word of comfort to the poor Cevennois, in bidding them be upon their guard; for assistance will come of a sudden, and that by the conjunction of the armies of several princes, both upon the Rhine, in Italy, and Flanders. He, like the foregoing Francis I. would be sole monarch and emperor of the world. The attempts he has made to this purpose are too many to mistrust it. The emperor has either been plagued by him all his reign, or the Turks, by his means. Spain has suffered formerly by his encroachments, and now is like to be made amends: and, Italy has been made a sea of blood. Holland had been often ruined by him, were it not for the House of Orange. England has suffered his affronts too often to trust in his perfidiousness any more; and, in fine, what part of the world has not been sensible of God's wrath in suffering such a wretch to live.

“ All will be faithful to oppose his pride.

And truth (when V appears) shall conq'ror ride.

“ 1st,

“ 1st, The meaning of this figure V, I take to be when V mighty potentates shall be in league together against the French king ; and this we see already between the emperor of Germany, queen of Great Britain, states of Holland, Charles III. king of Spain, and the king of Portugal : besides the Savoyards and his own subjects in the Cevennois, who have justly taken up arms against him ; and he is now in a fair way to be ruined within himself, fulfilling that part of this Prophecy, which says :

“ Thy ruin is within thyself to be,
Assisted by a mighty host at sea.

Which cannot be said to mean any other than his poor oppressed subjects, as well Roman as Protestant, who are willing to shake off the yoke of his slavery and tyranny ; to effect which, we are sensible, there are two powerful fleets at sea.

“ 2nd, The meaning of this figure V may relate also to the abdication, or dethronization, of this present Philip the Vth, who is king of Spain by no other right nor title than the forgery, power, and ambition of his grand-father Lewis.

“ More heads will be adorned with a crown,
And Papacy will Papacy pull down.

That is, there will be more kingdoms made out of the empire ; and this in part is fulfilled in the new king of Prussia, who was formerly but elector

elector of Brandenburg. The emperor will reduce the French king to reason ; but yet the king of the Romans will be a vexation to the see of Rome.

“ One kingdom shall to save another stand ;
And one shall lose a mighty tract of land.

“ This must expressly mean Spain and Portugal ; for Portugal being in the grand alliance, has, to save Spain for Charles III. made war against it. Now whether it will be divided afterwards to enlarge Portugal for its assistance in regaining it, I will not presume, but leave every one to judge as he thinks fit.

“ A neighbouring prince will make so much to do,

As all the world shall think he's honest to.

“ Who this prince is I am at a loss : it cannot be Portugal nor Tuscany. If he means Bavaria, which I have some reason to conclude he does, it must be this : that when the German princes were entering into an alliance, the elector of Bavaria, we may remember, made a very great stir ; most people thought him honest at first ; but so soon as the French pistoles were seen he unmasked himself, and appeared to all the world what he is. I know no other neighbouring prince but Savoy, which is indeed the next to him. I wish every thing well ; I see no reason yet to mistrust it.

But

But let the Cevennois take care they are not quash'd by a trick at last.

“ Then will thy golden age begin to bloom,
And, lo! th' tyrant shall receive his doom,
When V appears, and trees their leaves do shed,
All will rejoice to hear the wretch is dead.

“ Rejoice, all ye nations of the earth, for lo! the time comes, when every one shall enjoy himself, under his own vine, and eat the fruit thereof. The tyrant's doom is at hand; that is, the downfall of the French king. And this shall be when V appears. By which figure I take the total downfall of this oppressor to be anno Christi MDCCV. Further, by saying, ‘ And trees their leaves do shed,’ must denote no other than the time when, which will be in the autumn or fall of the leaf; at, or very near, which time, I do declare it to be the secrets of my soul, that Lewis will be no more. Then may we well rejoice at the tidings, clap our hands, and sing praises to God in the highest, for delivering his people, by taking the bloody and deceitful man from off the earth. Amen.”

MARLBOROUGH AND ROOKE.

The General Officer of the above honourable title did wonders in opposing the French on terra firma, who could not escape his ardour by finesse.

The

The British publick expected similar success on the part of their Navy, but the sea offered the enemy so many facilities, in avoiding actions, manœuvering, and flying, that Admiral Rooke was baffled on his own element, to the great mortification of himself and his brave companions. The following very respectable lines appeared in Tutchin's Observator, April 7, 1705.

“ As Hodge and Dick, who lately came From Lichfield and from Nottingham, Walk'd up the long litigious hall,
Where knaves at one another brawl.
Quoth Hodge, Adzookers, what are these,
That hang aloft as thick as bees?
Dick, who, besides his country tricks,
Was hugely vers'd in politicks;
And never miss'd a market day
To read what Jones and Dyer say, Thus gravely answer'd: Friend, quoth he,
I mar'l at thy stupidity:
If thou hadst read, as I have done,
'The news that weekly comes to town,
Thou hadst not been ignorant; but now
Listen awhile, and you shall know.
These, on the right, are what we took
From Frenchmen, by the noble R——.
Those on the left from Blenheim came,
Where Marlborough increased his fame:
For thus, in most of your addresses,
The matter wonderful express is;

They

They tell you plainly, how that we Obtain'd a double victory.

First one at land, then one at sea.

A jolly red-coat standing by,

Cry'd out, you whoreson, that's a lie :

Come up, you dog, and then look back,

Here's neither pennant, flag, nor jack.

With that an honest tar step'd in,

Before a quarrel could begin,

Cry'd, hold fast, brother, that is true,

These trophies all belong to you ;

We fought the French indeed, but they Would not be beat, but run away.

We saw their flags, but could not catch 'em,

But Shovel's going now to fetch em.

They all shook hands but Dick, and he

Was plaguily concern'd to see,

They spoil'd his noble Rookery."

STATE OF ENGLAND, 1705.

Lamentations on "the present awful crisis," and predictions of hitherto unheard-of calamities, must be familiar in the recollection of the whole present generation of Englishmen ; they cannot but remember that the "present awful crisis" sounded in their ears from the earliest hours of their comprehension, and their politicians and legislators endeavour at this moment to convince them that "the greatest of all misfortunes will be followed by one still greater." Were it worth
the

the trouble, we might cite lamentations and predictions of most respectable antiquity; but it will be sufficient to recur to the year 1705, when grumbling and growling prevailed to such a degree as to induce Malthus of London-house yard to publish "The Moderator, for promoting of peace, for reconciling differences between parties; to shew wherein every one misses it; and for uniting the hearts of the people to Her Majesty and government." The ensuing extract from the 34th page of volume I. is founded on the basis of eternal truth; and as the facts it contains cannot be contradicted, the passages should be read annually and publickly, as an antidote to growling and despondence:

"It is a matter that calls, at once, for lamentation and wonder, that whilst we are surrounded on every side with happiness, we are not so happy as to see it; a thing, which both shews our ingratitude and stupid frame, and that which infers a brutality, common to no nation but ourselves. In some of our papers we have shewed, the cause of our differences one with another; and in others, the blessings we are loaded with, more than other nations; in order, if possible, to engage us to be easy and thankful.

"But we will not run over the particulars we before discoursed of (though enough more might be added to every head): we shall rather instance in some other things, which we enjoy above the rest of the world. And (1.) if we consider the smallness of our island (which is but a little spot, a meer mole-hill, if compared with other kingdoms), we have cause to admire at the wisdom of Providence, that has surrounded us with waves, and separated us from the main by a vast channel. Did we join to France, though but by a small neck of land, there would be a possibility, either by superiority of numbers, by stratagem or treachery, to drive us from our strongest fortifications or intrenchments, and so of bringing an army into our bowels, and doing with us as they pleased; for what would our small numbers signify against so superior a force, which they would be able at pleasure, to send to our destruction? And the best that could be, would be continual alarms, endless fears, vast expence, and a meer slaughter-house for men; our ships could not come to our assistance, without taking large circuits, and losing much time; and, if separated, could not join without the utmost hazard and delays; whilst now they can sail round us, and be ready at any port in a few days. If they beat the enemy, there is room to pursue them; and if they happen to be worsted, there are plenty of harbours (which way ever they steer) to retreat and to be safe; our merchandizes are brought up directly to our metropolis, without unlading at distant parts; we can run over upon our enemies coast, look into his harbours, and have the account at London in a few hours, and a thousand other advantages, which every man may see, that is not wilfully blind ; whilst other countries, that border upon one another, are continually burning, plundering, raising contributions, besieging, and what not ; never enjoying any thing they can call their own. Oh happy little England ! thou Goshen of the universe ! thou dear sweet morsel, that all the world longs for, yet none can hurt thee, if thou dost not seek thy own destruction.

“(2.) Other countries are, a very great part of them, useless ground, either rocky or boggy, where the toil and care of the husbandman is thrown away ; whilst ours is fruitful all over, and very little barren ground in the nation ; and is so hilly and low by turns, that without a particular judgement of heaven, it is impossible ever to have a famine amongst us. For if we have a very dry Summer, the low lands never fail of bringing forth in abundance ; and if we have a wet season, the hilly parts make up the deficiency of the valleys.

“ We are placed in such a moderate climate that neither the heat of Summer nor the cold of Winter is so excessive as not to be borne ; nor do we live in darkness one half of the year, and all day the other, as some nations do. We have every thing necessary for delight, clothing, physick, and defence, amongst ourselves, had we no commerce with any other nation: what country can shew such broadcloth, and fine stuffs? where can we find such flesh of all sorts? where better fish and fowl? or who ever saw better corn, and in greater plenty, than we have it? And not only mines of coal, of brass, of lead, tin, iron, and copper, but of silver also, would we dig for it.

“Every spot of ground affords one sort of herb or other, to cure our diseases, which, were they more studied and used, it is very probable would be more agreeable to our constitutions, and be more conducive to health, than all the exotic drugs, and dangerous slops, which are at this day made use of; nor can we suppose that God created such numbers of herbs, and planted them in England, for nothing but to grow up every year, and wither away again; for it is observable, that very few plants, which are of physical use, are ever eat by the beasts of the field; so that if man does not use them, the end of their creation is wholly lost. We have stone for fortifications, lead and iron for shot and guns, and salt-petre for powder in great plenty, if we would take pains to make it; we have (or might have) variety and plenty of delicate liquors to drink; and, indeed, every thing else of the English product, that could make this life comfortable to us. But, besides all this, to make our cup brim full, we have the riches of both the Indies; the gold of Mexico;

the silks of Persia ; the perfumes of Arabia, and all other things our hearts can wish for, brought home to our doors, in spite of all the force our enemies can make against us.

“ How happy would other nations look upon themselves, did they enjoy but half those blessings, which we so ungratefully possess ! Pray, Gentlemen, you of the Grumbling Tribe, consider the miserable condition of France, whose monarch is absolute, and country desolate, and whose trade is insignificant, any where !”

CAUSES OF INSOLVENCY. 1706.

It may be interesting to some of my readers to compare the facts now laid before them on this subject with present customs. The Observator of John Tutchin, which has been noticed before, asserts, that the apprentices of his time prepared the way for their subsequent ruin, by becoming masters before they were men, by refusing to clean the shoes of the family, or carry their master's Bible after them to church, and by learning the way to the theatres rather than to places for divine worship. The ancestors of his generation, he adds, knew nothing of the practice of young men keeping horses during their servitude, to take the air in the country on Sundays and holidays ; the consequences of which were visible enough in their future lives. These evils Tutchin attributed to the total indifference of the masters ters as to the welfare of the souls and bodies of their apprentices : besides, he accused the former of endeavouring to ruin the latter on their commencing trade, by contriving to introduce them to parish-offices, to serve as jurors, and to have them called upon the livery in their companies, leaving them the disagreeable alternative of paying heavy fines, or non-attendance upon their customers or employers.

Another cause of bankruptcy arose from the general propensity of the young tradesmen for "playing at soldiers in our artillery grounds," before the expiration of their term, and when they became their own masters.

"Perhaps," says the author, "those that have been bred to trade may find out more means by which persons become insolvent ; but if we name a general cause, extravagance is the chief reason. This may be seen every where ; not only in the masters and mistresses, but even in the servants, who now, by their habit, cannot be distinguished from able housekeepers."

EXTRAORDINARY RELEASE FROM STARVATION.

Bridge, the publisher of the Loyal Post, gives the following relation, as an absolute fact, in his 44th Number, for March 4, 1706.

The scene of the occurrence is laid at a nameless place in Essex, in the neighbourhood of which a gentleman was in the habit of amusing himself
by

by hunting. One day the dogs started a hare, and pursued the animal with great vivacity till they encountered a large hollow tree, where they stopped unanimously, fixed their eyes on it, and barked in concert; naturally supposing that the hare had taken shelter in the tree, the gentleman and his attendants rode up, and soon heard a low moaning: surprized at this circumstance, he ordered a servant to feel whether any animal was within reach, while he stood prepared to obstruct its passage or escape; the domestic obeyed, felt a human head, and soon drew a child from the trunk, apparently two years of age: this unfortunate little fellow suffered so severely from hunger, that he had gnawed part of the flesh from one of his arms: the gentleman, touched with compassion at this wretched scene, determined to take the infant home, which he did, and soon recovered him from the consequences of his cruel confinement.

The ensuing Christmas produced an explanation of the mystery attending the discovery almost as remarkable as the barking of the dogs around the tree. Several young women had visited the town where the benevolent protector of the child resided, in order to keep the wassel of the season, one of whom seeing the boy at his door, immediately observed to a friend with her, "If Goody ——'s nurse-child was not dead, I should have sworn this had been it." The servant entrusted with the care of the foundling having heard this speech, conveyed the information to her master, who made further enquiry, and was conducted to the house of the nurse : he demanded of her where the child was which she had recently nursed ; the woman declared her charge died, and positively asserted it was buried in a church-yard she named ; the gentleman contradicted her in decided terms, and added his belief that she had destroyed the infant, insisting that the precise place of interment should be pointed out, that he might be satisfied, by personal examination, whether her statement was founded in truth.

Thus compelled, the woman reluctantly led her accuser to the burial-ground, where the earth was removed that covered the supposed body, in presence of proper witnesses, when, instead of the child, the persons employed removed from a coffin the wax resemblance of a face, and a figure made for the purpose dressed in the usual habiliments of the grave : this was complete conviction ; and the culprit at length confessed that she had been urged to murder the boy by his guardian, who was his heir to property amounting to fifteen thousand pounds : an imperfect sense of rectitude led this vile woman to fancy she pitied the forlorn state of the infant, who had lost both of its parents ; she therefore determined not to embrue her hands in his blood, though she did not scruple, in consideration of a large reward, to immure it in a hollow tree, there to perish by the lingering horrors of starvation.

Here my information ends, nor have I been able to trace the consequences of a prosecution said to have been intended.

STATE OF FRANCE IN 1706.

The ambition of Lewis XIV. which has been frequently mentioned in this work, though partially successful, was accompanied by other stings besides those of disappointment in the grand aim of his reign. Although, by virtue of his situation, he had almost unlimited authority over his subjects, he thought proper, or felt it convenient, not to press them so far for money as to keep his treasury full; he therefore invited the rich to send their plate to the mint, to be converted into coin, as a temporary resource; and those who did not choose to comply were taxed two livres for a particular mark to be stamped on each article. In the mean time the government-paper lost its reputation daily, and the discount amounted nearly to 50 per cent.

The publick voice in France never ventured beyond indistinct murmurs; and individuals confined their vexation to anonymous verses and epigrams, which they circulated only amongst their known and tried friends, except when a hardy politician contrived to placard the walls of Paris with his remarks on state-affairs, as was the case

case in October 1706, when many of the public places presented these lines in large characters :

“ On méprise à la cour l'esprit et les sciences,
 On renverse au palais les loix et l'équité,
 Le désordre est dans nos finances,
 Le commerce est sans liberté,
 La valeur dans nos camps est sans expérience,
 Et le devout clergé n'a plus de charité.”

A contemporary thus translated them —
 “ Which is as much as to say: That wit and learning are slighted at court; law and equity overthrown in the courts of justice; that our finances are in disorder; that valour in our armies is without experience (alluding doubtless to the fatal battle near Turin); that trade is without liberty (which is the very soul of it); and that our devout clergy are without charity.”

A MODERN MARTYR.

The 'Turks, who adhered with zeal to the faith of their prophet, felt great alarm about the year 1708, at the progress of the Roman Catholic Missionaries distributed throughout the dominions of the Grand Seignior, which induced that sovereign to issue his commands, requiring all his subjects to remain true to the religion of their forefathers. The Grand Vizier, faithful to his master, avowed himself the decided enemy of the Catholics in the Levant, and a fefta, or decision, of the Mufti, pronounced those deserving of death who disobeyed the orders of the chief of the Mussulmen. Previous to this period the minister had imprisoned the patriarch Deo Joannes, the patriarch Sary, and from forty to fifty Catholic Armenians, at the instance of the Schismaticks; on the 2nd of November Sary, and seven of the principal of the prisoners, among whom was the interpreter to the English embassy, were condemned to death; but those persons preferred recantation to the rewards of martyrdom, and were pardoned. Deo Goumidas, an Armenian Roman Catholic Priest, endowed with more stability of mind, and inflexible in his resolution to keep his religious vows, had long been an object of persecution, and the admiration of his countrymen, who subscribed a large sum to release him from the galleys, to which his enemies had condemned him.

The Grand Vizier decreed a second arrest; and, on the 3d of November, Goumidas heard the approach of his officers by the disorders they committed in the neighbourhood; this virtuous priest, regretting that others should suffer on his account, went to his door, and enquired whom they sought—they replied, Deo Goumidas—“I,” said he, “am the man—Let those people alone.” He was arrested immediately, and conveyed to the presence of the Vizier, then in the Divan, where he had assembled Deo Joannes,
and

and above 300 Schismatic Armenians: the Vizier sternly demanded of the prisoner why he had become a Frank, or Catholick; to which Goumidas answered, that, as a priest, he was obliged to study his religion, that he might be competent to instruct others; and that he had found the opinions of his Armenian accusers so erroneous, he could not in conscience subscribe to them. — “What are the errors you have discovered?” retorted the Vizier. — “Are you,” said Goumidas, “so well acquainted with the Christian faith as to be competent to decide between us?” — The exasperated tyrant, baffled and perplexed by the keen observations of his opponent, descended to threats, and closed the argument by exclaiming, “Dost thou know that I will put thee to death?” “Thou wilt do me a great favour,” meekly replied the martyr; “but remember, thou art not permitted to spill my blood for the sake of my religion, which is not that thou professest; and that thou shalt render an account thereof to God at the day of judgment.” — “Thou,” turning to Deo Joannes, “shalt be answerable for the blood of this man,” said the Vizier suddenly, starting up. “Be it upon him who arrested him,” replied Joannes. The Vizier, seating himself again, addressed Goumidas, “These men complain that thou hast abandoned their sect to adopt another.” “Which,” enquired the intended victim, “is the best?” — “They are both bad.” — “Then,”

con-

continued the latter, "what is it to thee which of the two I profess?"

Here the conference ended, and Goumidas was sent to immediate execution, with two Armenians: he prayed fervently on his way, and being met by a deputation of Greeks proceeding on business to the Divan, they requested his prayers. When at the place of execution, he exhorted his fellow-sufferers to die with constancy, and declared he would set them an example; after which he kneeled, and while he was repeating aloud his confession of faith, the executioner severed his head from his body.

PRINCE EUGENE OF SAVOY.

This hero was the admiration of Europe, and the inhabitants of those countries for which he fought against the French almost idolized him. Prince Eugene was at the Hague in April 1708, where the British sharer of his toils and glory, the illustrious Marlborough, met him, and together they gratified many an anxious gazer. M. Bothmar, the Hanoverian envoy, invited them to dine with him, and the concourse assembled to see them exceeded all former precedent; the managers of the opera profited by the general feeling of respect, and more than once filled their theatre by announcing their intended presence.

A remarkable instance of enthusiasm occurred to the Prince when on his way from Utrecht to

the Hague. A Dutch boor, or peasant, met the chariot which conveyed him, and knowing to whom it belonged, he stepped into the midst of the road, and commanded the driver, in an authoritative tone, to stop ; he then advanced to the door, and enquired which was the Prince ; the Prince made himself known ; the peasant seized his hand, kissed it with fervour, shed tears in abundance, and concluded the affecting scene by calling Eugene the first captain of the age, and wishing him all the happiness due to his transcendant merit.

Many of the diurnal papers of the above date contain a Prayer, translated from a copy printed and circulated at Vienna, which is said to have been composed and constantly repeated by Prince Eugene : one more truly excellent cannot be found in any language ; indeed the Prince seems to have had as well-grounded pretensions to the composition of a liturgy as to the character of a consummate general.

“ O my God, I believe in thee, do thou strengthen me ; I hope in thee, do thou confirm my hope ; I love thee, vouchsafe to redouble my love. I am sorry for my sins, O do thou increase my repentance : I adore thee, as my first Principle : I desire thee as my last : I thank thee as my perpetual Benefactor : and I call upon thee, as my supreme Defender.

“ My

“ My God, be pleased to guide me by thy wisdom, rule me by thy justice, comfort me by thy mercy, and keep me by thy power. To thee I dedicate all my thoughts and words, my actions, and sufferings; that henceforth I may think of thee, speak of thee, act according to thy will, and suffer for thy sake.

“ Lord, my will is subject to thine, in whatsoever thou willest; because it is thy will. I beseech thee to enlighten my understanding, to give bounds to my will, to purify my body, and to sanctify my soul.

“ Enable me, O my God, to expiate my past offences, to conquer my future temptations, to reduce the passions that are too strong for me, and to practise the virtues that become me. O fill my heart with a tender remembrance of thy favours, an aversion for my infirmities, a love for my neighbour, and a contempt of the world. Let me always remember to be submissive to my superiors, charitable to my enemies, faithful to my friends, and indulgent to my inferiors.

“ Come, O God, and help me to overcome pleasure by mortification, covetousness by alms, anger by meekness, and lukewarmness by devotion.

“ O my God, make me prudent in undertakings, courageous in dangers, patient under disappointments, and humble in success. Let me never never forget, O Lord, to be fervent in prayer, temperate in food, exact in my employs, and constant in my resolutions.

“Inspire me, O Lord, with a desire always to have a quiet conscience, an outward modesty, an edifying conversation, and a regular conduct. Let me always apply myself to resist nature, to assist grace, to keep thy commandments, and to deserve to be saved.

“My God, do thou convince me of the meanness of the earth, the greatness of heaven, the shortness of time, and the length of eternity. Grant that I may be prepared for death, that I may fear thy judgment, avoid hell, and obtain Paradise; through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.”

PRUDENCE AND TEMPERANCE OF BARBUNALES,
BISHOP OF LERIDA, 1708.

The competitors for the crown of Spain, Philip of Bourbon and Charles of Austria, had almost destroyed the fertile provinces for which they contended, by the means commonly used in war; but the partizans of the former, at the head of whom was the Pope, wished to add spiritual to corporeal misery, in the sufferings of their opponents. In pursuance of this plan the commissary general of the Crusada wrote circular letters to all the archbishops and bishops of the kingdom, commanding them to threaten the adherents of Charles with with the censures of the Church. The reader is now presented with the circular mandate, and the answer of a prelate, whose name must be venerated by every good Protestant.

“ MOST REVEREND FATHER,

“ Since the obstinacy, with which several inhabitants of this kingdom persist in their disloyalty to the King our Sovereign, to the prejudice of the repose of this monarchy, is so public and detestable ; and since fair means, far from remedying those evils, have served for nothing but to augment their animosity and stubbornness, as by experience we have learnt ; Reason, Necessity, and Justice require, that, laying aside those useless methods, we use upon this occasion the chastisement of Church-discipline, such as censures, and other spiritual weapons, against those who follow not the command of the Gospel, with respect to their allegiance sworn to his Majesty, &c.

“ The councils of Spain and France, from the first synod of Toledo to the 16th century, have thundered excommunications, anathemas, and curses, against the ecclesiasticks and seculars, who observed not the engagements and oaths sworn to their kings, &c. Whence it is apparent, how sensible the holy fathers of the councils were, that it was their duty to suppress and punish such abominable crimes. Wherefore the Church has always made use of spiritual weapons against the

seditions, and promoters of rebellion ; and the care of applying the necessary remedies being committed to the ordinary prelates, and, in a particular manner, to the holy Apostolic See, they have always behaved themselves with a real severity upon the like occasions, &c.

“ We find examples of this kind, as well in this kingdom as in foreign countries ; but principally under the reign of Pope Leo X. when the communities of the provinces were in arms : he sent a brief, dated Oct. 11, 1520, in the 8th year of his pontificate, directed to cardinal Adrian Florencio, then bishop of Tortosa, with orders to make use of censures, and the most severe chastisements, against the ecclesiasticks and seculars, who, contrary to their allegiance sworn to king Charles V. endeavoured to destroy his rights to the crown, and to disturb the public peace, by taking arms against their lawful sovereign.

“ At present that a like disposition is observable in the same inhabitants, it seems needful for us to make use of the same methods, as the most effectual to obtain that which other means have proved ineffectual about. And we have reason to hope, that the fear of ecclesiastical chastisements will extricate them out of their error ; principally where we judge that disloyalty and obstinacy more absolutely require the severest punishments of the prelates and ministers of the church. Wherefore, by the King's consent,
I send

I send you, most Reverend Father, this insinuation, exciting your ardent zeal for the saving of souls, and your known affection for the King's service ; to the end that, proceeding in the ordinary way, you cause edicts to be published in your district, with censures, and just and holy punishments ; and that you strictly enjoin all subjects, ecclesiastical and secular, communities and private persons, to preserve the fidelity they have sworn, and which they owe his Majesty ; suspending and excommunicating all such as shall act contrary thereto ; as likewise such as excite and foment any sedition and rebellion, contrary to the oath and homage of fidelity with which this kingdom and others have acknowledged his Majesty's lawful and natural right to the Spanish monarchy ; exhorting them, as faithful subjects, to oppose such whose sentiments are contrary to their obedience, &c. And in case any persist in their obstinacy, you shall declare them liable to the censures, as disobeying the orders of the Church. In so doing, Most Reverend Father, you will perform the duties of your pastoral office, for the service of the common good, in procuring that which is most convenient for the tranquillity of these kingdoms, and for the maintenance of religion according to conscience, and his Majesty's service, who so graciously applies himself to the preservation and advantage of his subjects, &c.

Madrid,

Dec. 22, 1708. D. F. ROD. DE MENDAROQUESA."

THE BISHOP OF LERIDA'S ANSWER.

“ I received with abundance of respect yours of the 22d past, wherein your Excellency, having before your eyes the disposition of these inhabitants, and the proceeding of the prelates in the council of Toledo, together with that of Pope Leo X. who made use of censures to keep the subjects in awe, and reduce them to the obedience they owe to their lawful sovereigns, thinks I ought to use the same method, and to thunder monitories against the obstinate. Whereupon I cannot but present your Excellency with a few reflections, before we proceed to the execution ; and, for that end, it will be necessary to enter into the examination and discussion of the matter.

“ It is true, the prelates of the Church have made use of censures upon the like occasions ; but it is also certain that they hardly ever proved successful. They were never made use of in Spain, but against the rebellions and conspiracies of the Goths ; and more resistance and changes were never found in this Kingdom than at that time. And, if we consider the monitories of Leo. X. and the effects of them in Castile, we shall plainly see, that the battle of Villadur, and not the excommunications, kept Charles V. upon the Throne. In the reign of Henry V. of Castile, pope Paul II. proceeded to censures, at the request of that Prince, and by the ministry of the nuncio Antonio tonio Venerio, against the conspirators; but it produced no other effect than affronts to the Pope's ministers, against whom they were ready to take up arms, without regard to the Pope's authority upon such occasions, concerning which they appealed to the next council. And though his Majesty prosecuted those conspirators with the most severe chastisements, yet so far were they from amending, that they were not so much as terrified; as we read in Mariana, Lib. xxiii. Cap. 2. The precautions used by the Pope in a like case, against the kingdoms of Sicily and Aragon, in the reign of Don Pedro the Great, met with no better success; no more than in Germany, Milan, and Florence, upon divers occasions; it being almost generally certain, that where temporal weapons have not the ascendant, spiritual make not the least impression.

“By this consideration we may see the force of the people's obstinacy, which refers to what St. Austin says of it in his letter to Parmenius, viz. That we must not excommunicate obstinate and such like persons, because, upon those occasions, instead of obtaining the desired effect, we incur other misfortunes, by their contempt of the censures, of which we have seen several pernicious examples in the church.

“Wherefore, I must tell your Excellency, that the obstinacy of the consciences of these inhabitants is now greater than ever; and so general, that that the King has actually fewer servants than when this Kingdom was subject to the enemy. Many reasons may be assigned for this, and as it is not fit I should enter into the examination thereof, but rather explode them, I find that, during these dispositions, my censures cannot be followed with any wholesome effect, especially at a juncture when the ill success of affairs abroad gives more life than ever to the hope, which this people never lost, of changing their master. These weighty reasons oblige me to suspend the publication of the edicts till it is seen how the other prelates behave themselves, that we may follow them with more safety; and it will be a great comfort to me, if I may receive a model of the expressions I must make use of; inasmuch as I am willing to behave myself, upon all occasions, according to my duty, and for your content and service.

FAMINE IN FRANCE, 1709.

There were several causes which concurred to produce that dreadful visitation of the human race, the principal of which was the protracted war with England and her allies. The male population of the country, enticed from their agricultural labours, became soldiers; and, far from practising their usual domestic frugality, wasted provisions provisions at every opportunity. Besides supplying the necessary consumption of vast armies, the government was compelled to stock all the frontier towns, to prepare for the sieges they afterwards underwent; these were successively captured, and the magazines of the troops in camp were often taken: the consequences might easily have been foreseen, but Lewis XIV. preferred the sounds of the cries of his people in distress to their blessings for a continued peace. At length part of France refused the usual fruits of the earth, and the misery of a portion of the community became too apparent for doubt or contradiction. The King, roused to a true sense of the general calamity, and alarmed at the unproductive season just passed, caused the clergy to divert the public attention from the original cause of the exhausted state of the granaries of the kingdom, and they, faithful to the monarch, encouraged acts of devotion. The order of the Cardinal de Noailles on this subject follows; and it will be perceived, that he makes more use of the sins of the people, in accounting for the famine, than of those of Lewis, though they were tolerably numerous in this particular point of view.

“THE CARDINAL DE NOAILLES’ ORDER CONCERNING THE PROCESSIONS IS AS FOLLOWS:

“Louis-Anthony Noailles, by Divine Permission, Cardinal Prince of the Holy Roman Church,

Church, by the title of St. Mary on la Minerva, archbishop of Paris, duke of St. Cloud, peer of France, commander of the order of the Holy Ghost; to the archpriests of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Severin, health and benediction. The hand of God still lies heavy upon his people; he joins barrenness of the earth to the other scourges with which he has visited us for several years. We begin to see the fulfilling of that terrible threatening which he made to the Israelites, Lev. xxvi. 19. I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass. The earth has now no more the fruitfulness natural to her, and denies, in many places, the greatest necessities of life. Heaven, far from warming the earth, and shedding upon her those kindly dews, that make her fruitful, gives nothing but cold and barren rains, and an unsettled weather, whose consequences are to be dreaded. It is our duty, therefore, forthwith to have recourse to the goodness and power of Him who is the only master of heaven and earth, who feeds even the vilest animal, and abandons none of his creatures till their ingratitude obliges him so to do. Though he is altered with respect to us, and has had for some time past nothing but rigours for us, he does not yet fail to give us some consolation, and to make us hope for more, if we labour to deserve it. The diseases which alarmed us do considerably abate;

and are not of such a nature as to cause the contagion which some over-credulous people apprehended. Let us go to Him, therefore, with confidence; he will be to us again the Father of mercies, and God of all consolation, provided we approach to the throne of his grace with humility and contrition. He is not deaf to our voice; nor does he cast out our prayers, but because they are neither as humble, nor as persevering, as they should be; for (according to St. James) What cannot the fervent prayer of the righteous man do? Let us make ourselves righteous, by a sincere and perfect conversion, that our prayers may be rendered acceptable unto God: let us cease to offend him, that he may cease to punish us: let us rend our hearts, and not our garments; and let us not put our trust in the outward shews of godliness, but in the real change of heart and manners. Let us be less earnest in our petitions for the end of our calamities than for the end of the sins which drew them down upon us. To obtain both, we must strengthen our prayers with those of the Church, and the intercession of the Saints. Wherefore we will have recourse to that of our holy Patrons; and we order, for that end, a general procession, in which the shrines of St. Marcel and St. Geneviève shall be carried. We find ourselves so much the more engaged thereto, in that the king, always full of faith and piety, has himself self done us the honour to declare his intentions to us, and in that the chief magistrates have let us know the desire of the people. For these causes, having thereupon conferred with our venerable brothers, the dean, canons, and chapter, of our metropolitan church, we hereby order, that on Thursday the 16th instant, all the chapters and convents of this city, who of right or custom are called to the general processions, do, by six a clock in the morning precisely, repair to our church, where they shall bring in procession, with respect and devotion, the shrines and relicks which are kept in their churches; in order afterwards, in conjunction with us, to make the procession to the church of St. Geneviève of the Mount, and thence return to ours, where the shrines of St. Marcel and St. Geneviève shall be carried with the usual solemnities. And, that the antient and just confidence of the city of Paris in her holy Patrons may the more surely obtain its effect, by this holy and august ceremony, people shall prepare themselves for it by a general fast, which shall be observed with abstinence from meat, in this city and suburbs, on Wednesday the 15th instant, and by particular processions, which shall be first made by the clergy of our said church on Monday morning; and afterwards, by all the abbeyes, chapters, parishes, and convents, of the city and suburbs, which shall come to our church, there to implore the help of the Holy Virgin, St. Dennis, and St. Marcel, patrons and protectors of this diocese; from whence they shall go to the church of St. Geneviève of the Mount, and that on the day and hour, and according to the order, which we prescribe below. We grant forty days of indulgences to the faithful who shall assist at this ceremony. We exhort them to come to it, not out of curiosity, but with a spirit of faith and repentance. We hope that they will be moved thereto by the edification which the piety and modesty of all the clergy, secular and regular, will give them. Lastly, we conjure all persons who shall be present at this solemnity, to bring dispositions with them capable of appeasing the just wrath of God, and of causing his mercies to lighten once more upon us; and we recommend to them, there to pray for the preservation of the king's sacred person, and all the royal family; as also for peace and the other needs of state. Also we order you to make known these presents to all abbots, deans, priors, priests, and other superiors of the secular and regular communities of the city and suburbs, to the end they may not plead ignorance, but observe them, and cause them to be observed by the persons under them. Given at Paris, in our archiepiscopal palace, the 10th day of May, 1709.

“Archbishop of Paris.”

The

The Queen of England alluded to the state of part of the Continent in her speech to both Houses of Parliament, November 17:

“ I think it proper to take notice to you, that the great dearth and scarcity under which our neighbours abroad have suffered this year, begins to affect us in some measure at home, by the temptation of profit, in carrying out too much of our corn, while it bears so high a price in foreign parts.

“ This occasions many complaints from the poor, for whose sake I earnestly recommend to you, to take this growing evil into your consideration, having not neglected any thing on my part towards the remedying of it, that the law would allow.”

Would it be credited by the subjects of Queen Anne, were they now alive, that little has been said by the present poor when they paid four times the price for a bushel of corn demanded in 1709?

THE FIRST EARL OF PORTLAND

Died in 1709, and was buried with much ceremony and splendor in King Henry VII's Chapel, Westminster. The account of him given by contemporary writers is highly creditable to his memory, and will bear repetition, as instances of fidelity and rectitude of conduct are not yet so numerous as to make the subject tedious. Mr.

Bentinck

Bentinck was the descendant of an antient family in the United Provinces, and selected by William III. when prince of Orange, for his page, from which situation he was soon advanced to the office of gentleman of the bedchamber. The prince had the small-pox in 1675, and that event gave his attendant an opportunity of shewing the warm attachment he had formed for his royal master: urged equally by duty and affection, Bentinck remained constantly at his post, assisted to turn the Prince, and gave him both nourishment and medicine. During sixteen days and nights the patient never called upon him that he did not immediately answer: at the close of that period the Prince became convalescent, and Bentinck's anxiety for his safety abating, nature yielded to disease and fatigue, and he was compelled to entreat permission to go home, where the small-pox reduced him to extreme danger, and he only recovered in time to attend the prince to the field of battle, in which he was ever found at his master's side.

It would have been highly ungrateful in William had he not patronized the affectionate Bentinck after such proofs of his regard; but he had still stronger motives in his courage and abilities, which entitled him to entire confidence in civil and military affairs. The invasion of England by the duke of Monmouth induced the Prince to offer James "the assistance of himself and troops against

against the invader ; Mr. Bentinck, who conveyed the message, had however but a cold reception, through some misconstruction : four years afterwards he was more successful, and contributed greatly, by his prudence, sagacity, and dexterity, to the accomplishment of the Revolution. William was thus furnished with the means of rewarding his favourite, who soon received the honour of the order of the Garter, several places of importance, and the earldom of Portland : one of the grants made to him excited some resentment, and it was mentioned with asperity in the House of Commons. In the same session he obtained equal credit, when one of the members asserted he was offered and refused £. 50,000, to forward the views of the East India Company. The King laid the foundation of the Peace of Ryswick with marshal Boufflers in the field of battle ; and he confided its conclusion to the Earl, as far as prudence permitted. The next and last public honour he enjoyed was the appointment of ambassador extraordinary to the court of France, where he is said to have supported the credit and interest of the British nation with considerable expence to himself.

On returning to England he had the mortification to find that the earl of Albemarle occupied the only place of which it is probable he would have been particularly tenacious — that of the monarch's favourite ; but this unexpected event was alleviated and rendered less intolerable by the knowledge that he still possessed the esteem of his benefactor. The Earl adopted the only resource left him, and retired to the enjoyment of a plentiful fortune, and the society of an amiable wife and family. Boyer asserts, that he distributed £ 2,000. per annum in charity during his involuntary banishment.

MISSON'S TRAVELS.

The fourth English edition of this work was printed in 1714; and it appeared in French; but with what success the compiler of these pages is unacquainted. — Misson was a native of France; and we are informed, in his dedication to the earl of Arran, that the duke of Ormond entrusted him with the early education of his patron. He appears to have been held in considerable estimation by the English literati, and particularly by Dr. Hoadly, bishop of Bangor. A copy of this work is now in my possession, which the author illustrated with all the plates given in the English and French editions, and many marginal notes, written in a very beautiful character, and presented to the prelate just mentioned, accompanied by the following note on a leaf preceding the title-page of the first volume :

“ Comme j'écrivois de ma main quelques notes, dans les marges de divers endroits de ce livre, une personne qui est survenue, a désapprouvé ce que je je faisais, disant que cela gâtoit en quelque façon le livre, et supposoit aussi une certaine sorte de familiarité — Mais ces raisons-là ne m'ont point touché : j'ai répondu que j'étois assuré qu'un homme du caractère de M. l'E. de B. prendroit en bonne part ces divers petits soins de ma plume ; et que peut-être, mêmes, il seroit assez obligeant pour m'en demander davantage, en témoignant par là qu'il n'a pas refusé quelque attention aux diverses choses qui sont contenues dans le petit ouvrage que j'ai eu l'honneur de lui présenter : heureux, si je pouvois attendre aussi de cet excellent homme quelques avis critiques sur les fautes les plus notables qu'il ne manquera pas d'observer, afin que je puisse faire un bon usage de ces remarques.

“ MAXIMILIEN MISSON.”

It may not be amiss to quote part of his address to the publick in page ix. that the reader may possess a marginal MS. note relating to it —

“ After speaking of the alterations and additions, I will not dissemble the matter, I could willingly have retrenched entirely several things which appear to me now not to be very necessary ; but one must observe that these retrenchments cannot be made after a book has had a certain happy course ;

course ; especially when there has been several impressions of it, and in different tongues. The publisher may take away what he pleases in one edition, but he cannot absolutely suppress the same, because it still remains in another ; and some will have what is retrenched, whether good or bad ; rejecting the editions in which those things are wanting, as being imperfect. These volumes then must go on in their way very near as they have begun. If some comptrollers say, that my best way had been to let it alone, as it was the first time, I will not much contradict them in that opinion.”—Note. “Ce livre ayant été écrit lors que j’étois au dessous de l’âge de trente ans, je le mets au rang de mes Juvenilia. J’ai résisté trois ans aux sollicitations des libraires, qui me demandoient cette nouvelle édition avec quelques additions ; et je ne la leur aurois pas accordée, si ma mauvaise santé ne m’eût pas détourné de mes plus sérieuses études : quod hic notasse liceat.”

Facing the 79th page of the first volume Mr. Misson has had a blank leaf inserted, on which he pasted, with great neatness, one of the billets issued by the priests of the cathedral of Cologne, for the preservation of travellers. The reader, upon consulting the annexed plate, will find an exact copy of this singular curiosity, which the author authenticated by writing on it : “This is

"The cathedral church remains in a very imperfect state; it is pity so fine a beginning was never completed. In the year 1162, the three pretended kings who came to adore our Saviour were brought from Milan into this church, where fame attributes many miracles to them. They sell for a penny a dozen little billets or notes which have touched them, and communicate their virtue."

The billet is very coarsely engraved, and has a representation on it of the Virgin, the infant Christ, Joseph, and the three kings, which, it is worthy of notice, have each received German names. It is thus inscribed:

"Sancti tres Reges,

THE REGALIA OF CHARLEMAGNE.

The crown, sceptre, globe, sword, &c. of this celebrated monarch were kept in the castle of Nuremburg when Misson wrote his new voyage to Italy. The recent affairs of Europe make these these curious articles interesting beyond their claim to antiquity ; and, as we have a modern Emperor of the West who frequently refers to the acts of his predecessor, I beg leave to present the reader with an engraving of the regalia, accompanied by Misson's description of it, and two of his MS notes on the subject:

“The diadem, or the crown, called Infula *, is of gold, and covered almost all over with precious stones. It is not closed as the Imperial crown is usually painted. Suppose that, instead of the fleurets on ducal coronets, there are plates rounded on the top, which are joined by the sides, and make the compass of the cap. There are eight of them, and that before is the most richly adorned. There is a cross on the top of all, and a semicircle supported between the two plates behind, which is raised above the bonnet, and joined to the top of the cross. The sceptre and globe are of gold ; and they say that the sword was brought by an angel from heaven.”

The French sentences following are the MS notes alluded to : “ C'est ici la Couronne que le Roi pose sur le tout dans l'écu des armes de sa Maison, en qualité d'Archi-Thésorier de l'Em-

* “ This is the crown of Charlemagne ; it weighs fourteen pounds. The privilege of keeping this crown was granted to Nuremburg by the emperor Sigismund. Je pourrois donner une description tres particuliere de cet même Couronne.

ARREST OF AN AMBASSADOR FROM RUSSIA, IN THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE.

Although this event was too important to pass unnoticed in our annals, a necessary attention to brevity has occasioned it to be more slightly mentioned in the histories of England than it will appear in these pages.

The czar Peter the Great had appointed M. Andrew Artimonides de Matueof his ambassador to the British court ; and on the 1st of August, 1708, his excellency was debtor to Mr. Morton, a laceman in Covent-garden, to the amount of £ 50. who arrested him on that day, and compelled the ambassador to find bail or be imprisoned. It is of little importance at present whether a dispute as to the charges in the bill caused delay in the payment, or whether Matueof was mean and prevaricating, or the tradesman insolent insolent and rapacious. As the laws relating to debtor and creditor then existed, no distinction was made between the representative of foreign majesty and the subjects of England; therefore Morton did not commit an illegal act, nor was the sheriff culpable who issued the writ. So far the defect lay with the legislature, which ought to have put it out of the power of an intemperate individual to involve his country in hostilities with half the Continent, and to bring the queen and government to the disgraceful necessity of apologizing for his violence of temper. Morton, however, must have known, in common with the other citizens of London, that less responsibility attached to an ambassador than to the natives of England, who, though not made an exception by law, certainly was by courtesy, for reasons of state, far more imperative than a loss of £ 50. by him could counterbalance.

Acting upon this imaginary concession, the ambassador deeply resented the arrest; nor did the Imperial, Prussian, and other foreign ministers fail to join with Matueof in demanding reparation for the insult thus offered to all the crowns of Europe. Morton, on the contrary, seemed certain of his ground, and wished to oppose the rights of an Englishman to the resentment of the world, knowing, that as he violated no law, that resentment, if carried to extremities, must be felt by him only as one of several millions of people, people, and that no power existed in the queen, or her ministers, to punish beyond the boundaries of the statute-book ; and it appears, he was further persuaded, no member of either house of parliament would propose an ex post facto law. It is evident, from these facts, that the government had no alternative between concession and war, and the former was wisely preferred.

Accordingly Charles Whitworth, Esq. who resided at Moscow as envoy extraordinary from our court, was vested by the Queen with the character of her Ambassador Extraordinary, expressly and purposely to make solemn excuses in her name for the insult offered to M. A. A. de Matueof, Minister of State, governor of the duchy of Jaroslaw, and Ambassador Extraordinary to Great Britain. This singular ceremony occurred on the 8th of February, 1710, when M. Basilis de Soltikof, chief carver to the czar Peter, and his cup-bearer M. Athanasius de Dmitreef Mamonof, who acted as Master of the Ceremonies, proceeded in one of the royal coaches, followed by twenty others, empty, to the house of Mr. Whitworth ; part of these magnificent vehicles were intended for the reception of the Apologist and his train ; and the remainder served to give the procession consequence. Upon the arrival of Mamonof and his coadjutor, they were introduced to Mr. Whitworth, who, having heard the purport of the visit, he accompanied them to the coach, in which he received the seat assigned to exalted rank, the carver sitting at his left side, and the cup-bearer facing him; the secretary and gentlemen of the embassy occupying their respective carriages, the whole set forward to the palace, where the courtyard was lined with two regiments of guards, those of Preobrazenski and Semionofski, richly cloathed, accoutred, and armed, who gave Mr. Whitworth the salute of honour as he passed.

M. de Narichkin, gentleman of the bed-chamber, received him at the first step of the great staircase; prince George de Scherbaty, counsellor of state, waited at the summit for the same purpose, and M. de Mussin Puchkin, privy counsellor, did him the honours of the antechamber, whence others of the royal household ushered him to the hall of audience, where the czar stood uncovered, under a canopy, leaning against a table, near a chair of state, surrounded by noblemen and general officers. Mr. Whitworth made his first obeisance the moment he saw the czar, the second in the midst of the hall, and the last on the platform of the throne; he then pronounced the following speech in English, a translation of which was repeated in German by his secretary, in order that several ambassadors invited on this disagreeable occasion might fully appreciate the apology; and finally one of the czar's officers read it in the Russian language.

“ MOST

“ MOST HIGH AND MOST POWERFUL EMPEROR,

“ It is not without a very sensible grief, that I am obliged to mention to your Imperial Majesty, the affront which was lately offered to your ambassador in Great Britain. And I should be much more concerned at it, were I not furnished with express orders, and full power, to declare, with how great diligence her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, my most gracious mistress, has endeavoured to give sufficient satisfaction for it, proportioned as well to her equity, as to her greatness of soul, and such as may serve as an evident mark of her constant friendship, which she has always had for your Imperial Majesty, and which she is desirous inviolably to continue to you.

“ The first advice of that unfortunate accident was no sooner brought to court, but the guilty were sensible of her royal indignation ; they were immediately arrested ; they were examined before the Queen in her council ; they were imprisoned, and prosecuted with the utmost severity of our laws ; and though these were found to be not extensive enough, yet they were declared infamous, with the unanimous consent of the whole nation assembled in parliament, who declared to the world, by a public act, how much they abhorred the indignity of the fact, and took the necessary precautions to prevent the like insolences for the future. Neither did they stop there, for those criminals were afterwards declared unworthy any favour or protection, and excluded from the general pardon which her Majesty the Queen caused to be published for all her subjects, even for those who had, in the most enormous manner, attempted against her sacred person; and though other criminals do actually enjoy that benefit, those are still under her Majesty's high displeasure.

“ And to the end her royal equity and friendship may be more conspicuous to the world, her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to honour me with the character of her ambassador extraordinary, commissioner, and plenipotentiary, and to give me power to represent her royal person, as if she herself was present, to declare, in the first place, her sorrow, and a just and deep abhorrence of that rash act, committed against a public minister, and especially against such a one as her Majesty has a very particular esteem for; and then to desire excuse for the defect and insufficiency of our ancient constitutions for the case of such an extraordinary violation of the law of nations, for which the criminals ought to have been punished with the utmost severity of the law and justice, conformably to the design of your Imperial Majesty; and lastly, to assure your Imperial Majesty, in the most sincere manner, how much her Majesty is inclined to maintain the antient friendship and good intelligence which has

has so long been between the two crowns ; which may it please your Imperial Majesty to observe more at large in her present letter, which may serve to convince you of the great inclination, and high esteem, which her Majesty the Queen has for your Imperial Majesty.

“ Wherefore I most earnestly desire, in the name of her Majesty the Queen, that your Imperial Majesty would be pleased to accept of the excuses above alleged, with your brotherly and wonted affection ; and not impute to her Majesty the Queen, nor the Britannic nation, an accident whereof only a few disorderly persons were authors ; but that, entirely burying it in oblivion, your Imperial Majesty will be pleased to continue, once more, your high inclination towards the Queen my mistress, and towards her people.

“ For my part, I shall esteem myself very happy if I can any ways contribute to this great work, so advantageous to the two crowns, and so necessary to the state of Europe.

“ Several great favours and marks of esteem, which I formerly received in the discharge of my office, of which I shall always retain a grateful remembrance, make me hope for the same favourable reception, during my present stay, in the exercise of my new commission, as often as I shall have the honour to make any new proposals at your Majesty’s court, by order of my most gracious Queen.

“To conclude, I beg leave to recommend to your Imperial Majesty's high protection, the subjects of Great Britain, who live in this country, with respect to the free commerce which their ancestors first began, with great expence, and the loss of a great many men, by the way of Archangel. Signed,

“CHARLES WHITWORTH.”

After the speech was made, and two translations of it read, his excellency the ambassador delivered to his Czarish Majesty her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain's letter, to the effect following.

After the usual titles :

“We have already written to your Imperial Majesty, to declare to you the great grief we conceived, for the unhappy affront which was offered to your ambassador, before he left our court. We have since received the letter which your Imperial Majesty wrote to us upon that subject; and we can assure your Imperial Majesty, that we were touched with true sorrow, when we saw how highly you resented the violence which had been offered to your Imperial Majesty's own person, in the character of your Imperial Majesty; and we were the more grieved on this occasion, when we reflected on the insufficiency of our laws to give as ample a satisfaction as we desired to make, as well for the just sense we ourself had of the indignity which had been offered, as to convince your Imperial Majesty how much we were inclined to make a suitable reparation of the injury done so good a friend and ally. But we must confess, that at the same time we had a singular pleasure, in observing your Imperial Majesty's desire to prevent the misunderstanding which might arise therefrom ; and the great esteem you shewed for our friendship ; as well as the care you expressed to preserve and cultivate it, by reciprocal marks of friendship and affection.
con-

“ Wherefore, we promise ourself, from your goodness, that, upon the representations which from time to time have been made to you in our name, by our envoy-extraordinary at your Imperial Court, your Imperial Majesty will be pleased to examine into the nature of this affair ; where your Imperial Majesty will see, that we have not the least inclination to favour the criminals, nor to screen them from justice ; but that there are insuperable difficulties, with respect to the antient and fundamental laws of the government of our people ; which, we fear, do not permit so severe and rigorous a sentence to be given, as your Imperial Majesty at first seemed to expect in this case ; and we persuade ourself, that your Imperial Majesty, who are a prince equally famous for clemency and for exact justice, will not require us, who are the guardian and protectress of the laws, laws, to inflict a punishment upon our subjects, which the law does not empower us to do.

“ Nevertheless, we have not been wanting, at the same time, to use all the means which we judged most effectual, to persuade your Imperial Majesty, and the whole world, of the sincerity of our intentions, and of our endeavours in this affair. And to the end the guilty might be punished so far as the laws and constitutions of our kingdoms which were then in force would permit, we gave express and repeated orders to our officers of justice, and to our ministers, to prosecute them with the utmost severity.

“ The prosecution has been long continued with very great diligence, and nothing has been omitted to bring it to as speedy a conclusion as possible. But after all, the matter is such, that we find ourselves obliged to inform your Imperial Majesty, that as well because of the different pleadings in favour of the criminals, the slow but indispensable manner of proceedings in a law-suit of so great importance, as of the case itself, which is of an extraordinary nature, against which no sufficient provision is made in the antient statutes of these kingdoms; it has not hitherto been in the power of our counsel learned in the law, to obtain a sentence, nor a final decision, of this affair.

“ Where-

“ Wherefore, considering all these inconveniences, and foreseeing the delays which might probably happen in the ordinary course of law ; and desiring at the same time to give you signal marks of our sorrow, as also to shew you the indignation of all our subjects on this occasion, we have passed an act of parliament, made in the most solemn manner by the great council and assembly of our kingdom of Great Britain, wherein is made a declaration as authentic as possible, of the just horror which our subjects in general have against this violent insult ; and all the acts and proceedings, which relate to the arrest of the person of your Imperial Majesty’s ambassador, are annulled, and rased out of the registers of our courts of Justice ; and those who had a share therein, are branded as infamous criminals, and obnoxious to the laws which were then in force. And if any person hereafter durst commit the like offence, or any ways violate the privileges of ambassadors and other foreign ministers, they will be liable to the most severe penalties and punishments which the arbitrary power of the judges shall think fit to inflict upon them, and to which no bounds are given in this new act. So that all insults of this nature will be prevented for the future, and the security which all Princes’ ministers ought to enjoy will be firmly established and preserved by this famous law. And this will remain as a monument to all posterity, of the deference

deference which has been shewn to your Imperial Majesty ; and all the ministers which shall come for the future, will be indebted for this extraordinary act for their protection, to the particular consideration which we and our people have had for your Imperial Majesty's honour. As, therefore, your Imperial Majesty cannot but see that we have used our utmost endeavours in prosecuting the criminals, and in causing them to be punished, though not with the success we could have wished ; and since we have procured an act to be made by the representatives of all our subjects of Great Britain, as well for reparation of what has been done, as to prevent the like insolences for the future ; we instantly pray your Imperial Majesty to accept of all that we have done on our side, as the most we could do here for your satisfaction ; whereby your Imperial Majesty will give us the strongest proof that can be of your constant affection towards us. And you may be assured, that we shall not fail on our side to do all that lies in our power, on all occasions, to shew you our gratitude, by our firm friendship and esteem.

“ And to the end that nothing may be omitted which is in our power to do farther by way of suitable reparation, we have thought fit to make choice of some worthy and able person, to declare to your Imperial Majesty in the most public and solemn manner the indignation we conceived at the

affront offered, and our concern that it is not in our power to cause the criminals to be punished according to their deserts. And as our trusty and well-beloved Mr. Charles Whitworth has merited our royal approbation, by his ability and experience in all the affairs which have been entrusted to him, as also by his good conduct at your Imperial Majesty's court for several years past; we have, therefore, given him a special power and commission to represent our person, as our ambassador extraordinary upon this occasion, and to make such excuses and declarations in our name, as will, we hope, give your Imperial Majesty entire satisfaction. And we do hereby desire your Imperial Majesty to be pleased to admit and receive the said Mr. Charles Whitworth as our ambassador extraordinary for this end, and to give entire credit to all that he shall say to you in our royal name, as if we were present to do it in person. We will only add, as a mark of our esteem for your ambassador himself who suffered this insult, that as we were sensible of his personal virtues and great qualities during his residence at our court, so we were more particularly concerned that such an injury should be offered to a gentleman of so great merit and consideration, being, besides, the ambassador extraordinary of so great a Prince, and so good an ally. And so praying, that the great Dispenser of all good things will vouchsafe to pour forth his heavenly benedictions upon

upon the person and family of your Imperial Majesty, we recommend you to his Holy Protection. Given at our Palace at Windsor, the day of August, 1709.

“Your Imperial Majesty’s

“His Czarish Majesty having received this letter from the hands of the ambassador, delivered it to the count de Golofkin, Great Chamberlain of his Empire, and was pleased to make the following answer in his own tongue :

“HIS CZARISH MAJESTY’S ANSWER.

“It was but requisite that her Majesty the queen should have given us satisfaction, by punishing the criminals conformably to our demands, in the most rigorous manner, as is the custom in such cases throughout the universe: but, seeing her Majesty has ordered you to make excuses in the quality of her ambassador extraordinary, conferred upon you expressly for this purpose, and to remonstrate that her Majesty could not inflict such a punishment upon them, because of the defect in that particular of the former established constitutions of her kingdom; and that, with the unanimous consent of the Parliament, her Majesty has caused a new act to be passed to serve as a law therein for the future; we accept all this for a proof of the affection her Majesty has for us,
and

and for sufficient satisfaction; and we will give orders to our ministers to settle entirely this affair with you in a conference."

After the conclusion of the Czar's answer, Mr. Whitworth retired without turning, making the same number of obeisances as when he advanced, and returned to his house in procession as before. The chief carver was commissioned to entertain the ambassador at the Czar's expence, who with his train lived most sumptuously for three days, attended by the royal servants.

On the 9th of the same month Mr. Whitworth waited upon the Count de Golofkin, great chamberlain of the empire, for the purpose of conferring with him and other ministers of the Crown on the terms necessary for the accomplishment of his mission, when the articles given in substance below were agreed to :

"That his Czarish Majesty emperor of Great Russia, will send orders to Monsieur de Matueof, his ambassador or plenipotentiary at the Hague, to notify provisionally, by a letter to her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, that Mr. Charles Whitworth, being vested with the character of her ambassador extraordinary, commissioner, and plenipotentiary, expressly and purposely to make excuses on occasion of the affront in question, has performed that commission; and that his Majesty, having regard to the instances of her Majesty the Queen, has been pleased to accept the said excuses made in her name, for satisfaction of the outrage done at London to the ambassador of his Czarish Majesty; with an intention thereby to shew the high value he puts upon the friendship of her Britannic Majesty, and on the continuance of that friendship, and in hope of the like return on her part in occasions wherein his Czarish Majesty may be concerned; and that, in consequence hereof, his Czarish Majesty is willing to forget the criminal proceedings of the authors and accomplices of the said affront, and desires her Majesty the Queen to be pleased to order them to be discharged from the process issued against them, and from the sentence pronounced, and the penalties to which they are condemned for the said insult.

“ His Czarish Majesty having a just regard to the faithful and signal services which his said ambassador, who was insulted, has performed, and in a gracious remembrance of the laudable zeal of his deceased father, his excellency M. Attemon Sergieiewicz de Matueof, first minister and boyarin in the reign of his Czarish Majesty's father and grandfather, of glorious memory, who, in exhorting rebels to obedience, crowned his faithful and important services with his blood, shed by the mutineers; he cannot but (in token of his favour and of his great good-will towards him) demand, after his own satisfaction, the particular satisfaction of his minister; namely, the reparation of his honour and that of his family, by the expedient dient of a letter from her Majesty the Queen, and the reimbursement of all the costs and damages which he has been obliged to be at, and to suffer, on account of the said affront.

“ His Czarish Majesty will give order to his said ambassador to demand his letter of re-cre-dence, which he refused to accept when he left London, as well as the usual present and the yacht which her Majesty caused to be offered to him, and this because of the aforesaid affront.

“ All that is above specified being executed, his Czarish Majesty will acquaint her Majesty the Queen, that he is content with the aforesaid satisfaction, by a letter which shall be delivered to the ambassador, Mr. Whitworth.”

The Act of Parliament alluded to was intituled, “ An Act for preserving the privileges of Ambassadors and other Public Ministers of Foreign Princes and States :” which declared all suits and prosecutions against the Muscovite ambassador and his bail vacated ; “ that all process, whereby any Ambassador or Public Ministers, or his servants, may be detained, or his or their goods distrained, shall for the future be adjudged void ; the prosecutors be deemed violators of the laws of nations, and suffer such penalties and corporeal punishment as the lord chancellor and the chief justices, or any two of them, shall determine : Provided that no bankrupt putting himself in the service of an Ambassador, &c.

shall have the benefit of this Act ; nor the servant of such Ambassador, &c. unless his name be registered in the Secretary's office, and transmitted to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who shall hang the list of such servants up in some public place of their office."

EXTRAORDINARY ROBBERY.

The royal family of Prussia had removed from the palace at Berlin to Oranienburgh, for a few days, in the month of July 1710, and, according to a singular custom of that court, their apartments remained in the state they were used till their return, and consequently well guarded. A person, aware of the impossibility of plundering those apartments by the usual means of entrance, formed the strange and hazardous resolution of exploring them by a chimney ; accordingly he procured a rope-ladder, descended, and found his way to the golden toilet of their majesties, where he made choice of an ewer and two basons of gold, and other articles of great value ; he then discovered a rich bed, not long before presented to the queen by her royal husband, and completely stripped it of the gold fringe and lace which adorned the drapery ; sated with his success, this artful depredator ascended his dark and dangerous staircase, and contrived to leave the palace with his spoils, unperceived either by the domestics or guards. Sufficient time elapsed before before the loss was discovered to enable the thief to leave the city without suspicion, as, after closing the gates, and making every possible enquiry, not the least trace could be found of him, or his booty. Those who think the above relation incredible should call to their recollection the recent act of sacrilege committed at St. Paul's Cathedral, where doors of iron, and wood cased with iron, and a chest secured by three locks, were opened and closed by persons who are yet unknown, and who contrived besides to pass the great doors of the church, the exterior gates of the railing, and what is still more wonderful, many watchmen, though heavily laden with silver articles suited to the vast size of the sacred building to which they belonged.

DR. SACHEVERELL.

The compiler need not to remind his readers of the interest this reverend gentleman excited in the reign of queen Anne, by the diffusion of his particular opinions of the religion and government of the State. He had numbers of friends, and numerous determined enemies; the former treated him with all the honours due to a successful commander; and the latter insulted him in print, and personally when an opportunity offered. On one particular occasion some gentlemen met him on the road between London and Hampstead, and indulged themselves by using

such gross language and invective as is sometimes produced by politicks acting on fiery brains, or the free use of wine; the doctor, highly exasperated, threatened to report the indignity to the Queen, who, he declared, would be induced by his representations to ruin the offenders by a prosecution ex officio. The Flying Post of October 17 contains a subsequent proposal on the part of the Doctor, in which he consents to discontinue all proceedings, on condition the gentlemen signed the following submission:

“The Reverend Dr. Henry Sacheverell, having out of his great clemency and mercy readily consented to forgive the assault and trespass we rashly committed on the road betwixt Hampstead and London on his person, and the abusive language we gave him, we think ourselves in duty bound to acknowledge the generous favour we have received, in that he will not prosecute us for those rude indignities and provocations we offered him: for which we thus publicly ask his pardon.”

This they refused to do peremptorily, and published the ensuing statement, which terminated the affair:

“SIR,

“In order to let you into the true meaning of the enclosed (meaning the paper of submission the doctor would have had the gentlemen to sign that was exhibited in our last) it will be necessary to

to give you some account of the affront offered to Dr. Sacheverell in his return from Hampstead ; or, at least, to touch upon the consequences of that story which has made so much noise in the world. That most Reverend Gentleman being regaled on a certain day by the minister of Hampstead, the mob thought themselves obliged, in compliance to the times, and to shew their reverence to that gentleman's triumphs over the whole legislative authority of this kingdom, to make bonfires, and other demonstrations of public rejoicings ; and, according to custom, stopped all passengers, and insulted those who had more honour than to bow down and worship their idol : amongst the latter, were the young gentlemen who unfortunately gave occasion to the doctor to exercise that clemency, which, in all the other actions of his life, he has seemed so great a stranger to ; but so it was : these young gentlemen, warm with wine, and impatient of any restraint, at least from so vile a mob, raised on such an occasion, resolved to return the affront to the person who was the first author, and did, in their passion, give him some hard words, which they were very sorry for the next morning ; and accordingly two of them went to him, and told him they were sorry for what had happened, and hoped he would pass it by : but the good doctor, full of Christian charity and moderation, thundered in their ears, Young Gentlemen, Young Gentlemen, I'll ruin you; I'll speak to the Queen to ruin you. With this wholesome severity the Gentlemen took their leaves, and resolved to stand the trial which the doctor threatened them with: and accordingly, on Saturday last, they appeared at Hicks's-hall, before the Bench of Justices; where the doctor, in open court, with his own hand, tendered the paper, to be signed by those gentlemen, upon which he would forgive all injuries. But the gentlemen resolving to stand the utmost severity of the law, rather than sign such a paper, and the doctor despairing to make any addition to the brightness of his character by carrying on' such a prosecution, threw the paper at them in open court, and told them something warmly that he did forgive them. And so ended this whole affair.

“The paper needs little comment, the thing speaking itself, and perhaps may be the only instance, where a private clergyman assumed to himself a style which can become nothing less than a crowned head, or a sovereign pontiff: unless it may be thought, that even in this, he has only acted consistently with himself.”

SPECIMEN OF POLITICAL POETICAL CRITICISM *.

“ There is certainly no creature in the world so vain as a Whig: none but his generals have courage; none but his ministers have probity or politics; none but his patriots principles; none but his bank has money; none but his ladies beauty; none but his authors learning; and none but his poets wit. I shall not go about to prove the vanity of these pretences, the matter being so very notorious, especially with respect to wit; in which the Tories every day distinguish themselves more and more, and make new acquisitions: so that they will soon have all the wit on their side, almost as soon as they will have the places. If there were any mortal living that could be supposed to question this, how many instances could I produce to demonstrate it? Examiners, Doubles, Atalantis's, men and women, all authors of a size, might be fairly shewn together, in order to make it good: but I shall satisfy myself at this time with one instance only. Indeed, it is an extraordinary one: an acrostic, handed about by persons of distinction of that side with great applause, and not at all undeserved, as will be seen immediately. The name of the author I could not learn, but the gentleman who gave me his verses assured me he was tam Marte quam Mercurio, the very same that Sir Walter Raleigh was: and though he is so modest as to conceal himself, his fame will outdo every thing that has been heard of in Parnassus, since Mr. Quarles flourished.

* The Compiler offers this extract without wishing to promote the opinions of the author, and merely as a curious article.

The Acrostic is this :

‘ Hail ! bright assertor of our free-born state !
Active, tho’ still, like our approaching fate :
Rousing the spirit of our lethargic isle,
Ling’ring beneath a most destructive smile.
Eager of right, Britannia undeceiv’d,
Yea, glorious Anna’s perfect ease retriev’d.’

“ Though this acrostic is modern, there are certain mysterious expressions in it, that will hinder its being so intelligible to posterity as might be wished : for which reason, a small comment upon it will not be very impertinent, nor, I hope, unacceptable to the courteous reader.

“ Hail ! is a word of great antiquity : the Jews used it, as every one knows, when they were doing the most wicked thing that ever was done in the world. It is also met with in choruses on the stage, and has a fine effect in incantations, which signify charming, and singing, or chirping, as well as enchanting and bewitching ; though all those interpretations are very applicable to this author and his poem.

“ Bright

“ Bright assertor. Dark assertor is never used by the best writers ; for assertors are always bright. However, there are several sorts of assertors : king William was an assertor, but that was of liberty only : the last parliament were assertors, but that was worse still, for they were only assertors of king William and the Revolution. What kind of assertor is here meant (since there never was an assertor of nothing) appears by the next words, which are,

“ Free-born state. But here it will be necessary to add a restriction, lest those words should be taken in any antimonarchical republic meaning ; for doubtless the poet intends them in a good church-sense, that our state is as free, as indefeasible and hereditary can make it : which is surely free enough, and proves it to be well born, and blessed with original freedom, without any regard to that foolish accidental liberty which it received at the Revolution.

“ Active, tho’ still : a pretty image that ! and borrowed, as I suppose, from the late circumstances of the church, which was at the same time both in danger and safe. Active, tho’ still ! Nothing can be more just or clear. But mind the simile that follows —

“ Like our approaching fate. Here the critics will have it, that our author has some meaning that is not so well ; and that he mixed a little touch of satire to give this thing a relish. But if I am

I am to speak my conscience, I think his friends are to blame, if they are angry at him for any meaning, of which they ought not to suspect him.

“ Rousing the spirit of our lethargic isle. Here he seems to compare Great Britain to something that’s asleep ; but he rightly observes, that she’s almost awake now : her eyes are opening, and her spirit will doubtless be roused ere long. This needs no interpretation.

“ Ling’ring beneath. This should seem again to be satirical, as if the island were wasting under a consumption. But the next words clear the point ; which are these :

“ A most destructive smile. Yet here the allegory, by being a little too frequently varied, is grown somewhat obscure. It does not appear by the poet, who it is that smiles : only it is probable he means some syren, that is now pleased, and in good humour, because he says the smile is destructive ; for I never read of any smiles that were destructive, but the smiles of these ugly creatures, that were half women, half fish, and yet were used to bewitch people. This will puzzle the commentators of the next age, for even in ours we can hardly guess at it.

“ Eager of right. A strong expression, though not very intelligible ; but there can be no harm in it. Eagerness is always commendable, when a person is sure that what he is eager for belongs to him, him, and is his right : as for example, if our poet should be eager to assert his title to this acrostick.

“ Britannia undeceiv’d ; not quite yet, as I noticed before, but in a very fair way to it.

“ Yea ; a very fine affirmative, most antient and sonorous : and those that think it was only added to tag out the last letter in the acrostick, know nothing of the force of monosyllables, nor of the true spirit of poetry.

“ Retriev’d : A word not much in use among the writers of verse ; but it was chosen, I suppose, by this author, because of the great importance of it eight years ago, and was now transplanted, by poetical licence, out of the Vote of Parliament into this acrostick. A strange fate has attended this word from the time it was revived with such great propriety of speech. It was in full force, and many good speeches were made for it by admirable British orators, when nothing had been done, and it could have no signification ; and now, after forty towns and battles won, it is all of a sudden grown obsolete again. But I think our author has taken care at last to provide for its immortality ; and by choosing it for the very lowest and most weighty word of his whole acrostick, he has fixed it in a place where it shall for ever stand, as the foundation or bottom of his well-built poem, when votes and even acts of parliament shall be quite forgotten.

“ I shall

“ I shall not mind what people may say to me for making these few useful criticisms on the foregoing verses ; I value an author for his love of poetry, as much as some value a poet for his art ; and may this person write in quiet the remainder of his days, as soon as the war is ended,

‘ ——— And choose for his command,

MAC FLECKNO.

“ The only danger to a great man from such incense as this is, that such immoderate praises often spoil and corrupt the good habits of the mind ; nor is it always in his power to distinguish between the false attempts of a flatterer, and the honest commendations of a friend. The Greeks said, flatterers were like so many ravens, croaking about high ministers ; and that they never lifted a man up, but as the eagle does the tortoise, in order to get something by the fall of him. It is very hard to know the hearts of men ; but if ministers will be doing prodigious and extraordinary things, they must expect to be commended for their actions : and I should think this author as unlikely to have guile or design as most that I have met with. I shall now shew you, on the other side, what sorry poets the Whigs are ; they have nothing of their own, and are therefore forced to borrow of the French, whom they pretend to hate so much. One of them shewed me some

*' Un Intendant ? qu'est que cette chose ?
Je définis cette estre, un animal,
Qui, comme on dit, scait pecher en eau trouble.'*

“ An Intendant ! What is he ?
Here his true description see :
He's an animal, that seems Pleas'd to fish in troubled streams :
Let the Public sink or swim,
'Tis the self-same thing to him.
If you say the State and Crown,
In his hands are tumbling down :
Come, have patience, Sir, he cries,
Funds shall fill, and stocks shall rise.
If you ask him how, or why ?
Straight you have in one reply,
All the reason he can tell ;
Pho ! I warrant things go well.

“ Aristophanes has an odd whim in one of his comedies * : He introduces a chief person of his play, endeavouring to persuade a man that made sausages to resolve upon meddling with affairs of state. The man was surprised at his discourse, and asked, why he would despise and laugh at a poor fellow, who had never employed his thoughts or time in any thing but making sausages. Upon which the poet instructs his other person to speak thus : Behold all these ranks of people, you shall be a great leader and chief among them ; you shall tread upon the senate, and tie up the hands of our generals. Who, I ? says the sausage-maker : Yes, you shall do it, quoth the other person. Get upon this table where you make your puddings, and look all about you : do you see in that scene the custom-house, and all those ships that are laden there with merchandize ? See them ! yes, says the fellow ; what then ? Why all those things shall be sold by you ; the oracle says you shall be a very great man. How should that be, for God's sake ? cried the fellow. How should I be a great man, that am but a pudding-maker ? Because, said he, you are bold and wicked. But I think myself unworthy of greatness, said the fellow. What does that signify, answered the other ? Do you think yourself a good or an ill man ? Nay, for that matter, said he, I am bad enough. I wish you joy, replied the other, you will find yourself so much the better qualified when you come to do business, for our commonwealth has nothing now to do with men of learning and probity, but is wholly governed by the ignorant, impure, and immoral ; therefore do not despise what the Gods tell you by their oracles, which prophesy very great honours that will be done to persons of your trade. But how, said he, is it possible that I should govern the people ?

With

With all the ease in the world, answered the other: do only what you are used to do, MIX, JUMBLE, DISTURB AND CONFOUND ALL MATTERS; feign and invent any thing to please and delude the rabble: for the rest you have a great many talents that are proper to gain their favour. You have a false tongue, and a mischievous unlucky understanding; you have some little smattering also in the law: in short, you have all the qualities that our republic wants at this time, and that are necessary to make you a very great person.

“Monsieur le Clerc, taking notice of this scene, says, The character was drawn for Cleon, who was a troublesome orator, an enemy to the best men of the country, and to the greatest generals of that government. He says the poet very justly exposed this person in his play; who having never given the least proof of his sincerity, or love of his country, had yet made himself considerable, by affecting a false zeal for the interest of the people, and by living at open variance with the nobility and the senate. Monsieur le Clerc says further, That the Greek and Roman histories have many illustrious examples of great men, to whom their country had infinite obligations, ruined or banished; not for having been found guilty of any crime, but only for having been accused by such orators as this Cleon. Those that sought the great employments, and were resolved to get them, had need, he says, but of two

two things ; one was, to affect an air of popularity, which was easily enough maintained : the other was, to affirm any thing boldly, that suited with the present taste of the multitude. Provided they had these two qualities, no vice, he says, of their own could hurt them : it was no matter if they were ignorant, malicious, saucy, revengeful, violent, and cruel ; they covered all these faults under the specious veil of zeal for the public good ; their ready gift of speaking passed for sense and understanding in the minds of the multitude, who had still less knowledge than themselves. And though in reason they ought to have made themselves odious by the falsehood of their accusations, and the violence of their prosecutions, the blind and credulous people did not find it out ; but took their most envenomed passions for an extraordinary regard to the safety of the state.—And doubtless it was this very same Cleon that Plutarch mentions in his Political Precepts, who had a hundred heads of fawning flatterers licking about him, as the Comedian speaks, and who debased himself to court the favour of the multitude ; doing all things to humour them, and joining himself with the worst and most distempered of the people against the best. God preserve all countries from such Cleons, and such sausage-makers !”

CURIOUS REASON FOR THE DISMISSAL OF A

“It is said (observes the editor of the Supplement), the last Grand Vizier’s disgrace happened after the following manner: Numan Bassa was always endeavouring to persuade the Grand Seignior to maintain justice, and the fundamental laws of the government, and to retrench superfluous pleasures. He was one day commanded by the Sultan to send some courtiers into the Seraglio, to throw the javelin there in his presence; but, instead of doing as he was bade, he sent him a book, containing an abridgement of the Ottoman histories, and desired him to spend a few hours in the perusal of it. The Grand Seignior was highly displeased to see himself thus thwarted, though in his pleasures only, and by his first and greatest minister; and jealous, besides, of the superiority which that minister had by such a step seemed to claim over him (the more because Numan’s father dethroned the Sultan’s father Mahomet), he sent for him to court the 16th instant, and made him deliver up the great seal; which done, he sent him to Porto Picolo, three leagues from Constantinople, in order to be transported to his former government of Negropont.”

SPIRITED CONDUCT OF M. MASNER.

Masner was an inhabitant of Coire, the capital of the Grisons, and had deeply interested himself in the affairs of the Allies, when contending with France in the reign of Lewis XIV. for whom he acted as the Emperor's commissary in passing their troops through that territory. The French government, at a loss in what manner to punish him without involving themselves with his countrymen, at length determined to seize his son, and, by conveying him to France, thus to hold him as a hostage for the father's future conduct. Young Masner was then a student at Geneva, and had an intimate friend, as he supposed, in a youth named Merveilleux: this villain, bribed by the agents employed on the occasion, contrived to lead the unsuspecting Masner within the boundaries of the French territory, where persons waited by appointment, who seized him, and carried him a prisoner to Lyons.

Equally enraged and grieved at the hazardous situation of the youth, the elder Masner laid violent hands on the interpreter of the French embassy, and confined him in his own house at Coire, hoping that, by so doing, he should cause a discussion of the whole affair, and obtain the liberation of his son; accordingly the ambassador of France made a formal complaint, and Masner justified justified his retaliation ; but the former was too subtle for the latter, and he recovered his interpreter by merely promising, in the name of his master, to restore the prisoner, which promise the king never thought of performing.

The government of France now supposed itself to be perfectly secure against any further molestation from Masner. This, however, was not the fact ; for that intrepid gentleman hearing that the Grand Prior Vendosme had departed from Venice on his way to Paris, which would lead him through the Grisons, and across a narrow piece of territory belonging to the Germanic Empire, he procured several trusty persons, well armed, who, with himself, waited in ambush on the territory alluded to, and at a favourable moment seized that great dignitary, whom he conveyed into Germany, determined not to lose a second hostage for the safety of his son. M. St. Luc the French ambassador immediately acquainted his court with Masner's new enterprize, and at the same time wrote the following letter to the government of the Grisons.

“ MAGNIFICENT LORDS,

“ The moment I was informed of the unexampled outrage committed by Thomas Masner of Coire upon the person of M. the Grand Prior of France, I had the honour to send the King an account thereof. His majesty commanded me to signify

signify to you his surprize that so mean a private man, without title or character, should presume to violate the alliance and neutrality, by seizing in your territories, a prince for whose blood all nations have a veneration.

“ You may well judge, Magnificent Lords, that the King will not seek satisfaction from such a one as Masner. The better to convince you, and the other European potentates, of this, his Majesty has ordered me to demand of you, in the first place, the enlargement of M. the Grand Prior, his retinue and equipage, which you will cause to be delivered to me, if you please, on the Swiss territories. I desire you, at the same time, to signify to me, your intentions concerning the punishment the said Masner's crime has deserved. I assure myself, you will wipe off the dishonour with which that insolent person has sullied you ; and shew that if nature produces monsters in your country, you know how to crush them sooner or later. By consulting your honour and consciences, you will preserve the general esteem you have acquired, and the friendship of the greatest King in the world, who is your most antient ally.

“ If, contrary to his Majesty's expectation, you do not every thing that is suitable to your glory, with regard to the present case, the consequences must be imputed to yourselves. But I hope the publick will be as much instructed by your

your conduct as they are scandalized at all the enormities of Masner. I impatiently expect, Magnificent Lords, a speedy answer, which will determine the King to take that course you shall oblige him to. I desire you, to this end, to call immediately a congress of the leagues; and to inform me, as soon as possible, what resolution you shall take. I wish it may be agreeable to the common interest, and that I may find opportunities to convince you what pleasure I take in serving you," &c.

As M. St. Luc declares, in the above official note, the Grand Prior was "a Prince for whose blood all nations have a veneration," the reader should be informed, that he belonged to a natural branch of the house of Bourbon, a house that Lewis XIV. omitted no opportunity to increase, and though he declared all those his very near relations legitimate, it has been said, the real princes of the blood royal were no great admirers of their brothers and cousins, nor had they any moral reasons for so doing if they generally resembled the very reverend Grand Prior, whose character is thus described in the Memoirs of the Court of Lewis XIV. by M. Anquetil and his uncle, also a Grand Prior, as portrayed by Bussi :

"Besides the Duchess of Portsmouth, this prince (Charles II.) had other inferior mistresses, of whom he was very jealous. The Grand Prior of France (Vendosme, brother to the duke of that name), then young and handsome, and since so much celebrated by Chanlieu, and other wits of the age, had been banished for some irregularities, and passed the time of his disgrace in England. He was there very well received by the King; and, by way of gratitude, he thought fit to seduce a girl to whom he knew Charles was violently attached. The Monarch sent messages to the Grand Prior, entreating him to desist, which he disregarded. He offered him money, titles, and to obtain his accommodation with the court of France; all was in vain. The King forbade him to approach his palace. He laughed at the prohibition. He appeared every evening at the theatre with his prize, and placing himself opposite to the Monarch, braved him with his victory. Charles, unable to find any other shift to get quit of him, wrote to Lewis, entreating that he might be recalled into France. This was, however, only followed by a permission to return; to which the Grand Prior answered, that he found himself very agreeably situated in England, and still kept up the joke. The Monarch, losing all patience, acquainted the King of France with the uneasiness his rival made him suffer, and at last obtained a positive order that he should instantly return to France."

St. Luc's memorial produced another from Mr. Manning, the British Minister, addressed to the Coun-

Counsellors and Commons of the three Leagues of the Grisons assembled in consequence of this affair, which follows :

“ MAGNIFICENT LORDS,

“ You were surprized, no doubt, at the haughty and threatening manner, in which the Ambassador of France at Soluthurn demanded of you, first the enlargement of the Grand-Prior of France (seized by one of your members on the lordship of Razuns and carried off into the territories of the august house of Austria, where he is at present) and then the punishing of him who did the action.

“ To clear up this affair a little, which at first may seem of consequence to those who do not know the true state of the case, I entreat you to permit me, as a friend and servant of your laudable Republick, to make the following remarks upon the facts in question.

“ Every body knows, Magnificent Lords, the treacherous means, used about the beginning of May last, by hired ruffians, to seize and carry off the son of M. Masner, whom they had engaged to take the air with them on the territories of Savoy. 'Tis this base action, contrived and executed by the French on the person of one of your members, an innocent youth of 16 years of age, who was following his studies at Geneva, and who had never done the least thing to draw upon himself the resentment of France; 'tis this villainous and scandalous treatment, I say, of one of the children of your republick, that you have just cause to take offence at, and was the motive of all that his imperial Majesty's commissary has since done to recover his son. You see, Magnificent Lords, that the French were the aggressors, and first violated the neutrality by seizing a Grison, contrary to all right and justice, who had never done any thing against their interests. I will suppose France may have cause of displeasure against the father; but methinks 'tis ridiculous to make that a pretence for detaining the son. Is there any country in the world, except France, where the children are made responsible for the actions of their fathers?

“ You well know, Magnificent Lords, that Counsellor Masner used all the most respectful methods to recover his son so unjustly detained. Was ever any regard had to his supplications, or to the remonstrances which your laudable Leagues had the goodness to make in his behalf? 'Twas to no purpose, to use public intercessions with the Count du Luc, and to urge to him the alliances and neutrality. All this makes little impression on the minds of certain ministers, who think themselves the only men privileged to commit violences without fearing reprizals. They openly made their sport of those applications to them, and thereby drove the father, provoked by their contempt of his submissions, and pierced with grief for the unjust imprisonment of his son, into a kind of necessity to procure his liberty by other methods. As for the Grand Prior of France, who has had the misfortune to fall into the hands of a man justly irritated against his nation, I will not enter into the reasons alledged to justify this reprizal, with the consequences of which the Ambassador of France endeavours to terrify you. I will only say, that if ever any thing could extenuate a proceeding of this nature, 'tis in the present case. You cannot but remember, Magnificent Lords, that M. Masner, after the negotiation of M. Merveilleux by M. Viguier, in the name of the Count du Luc, trusting to the justice of his cause, took a resolution to make his appearance before an ambassador of France, who was incensed against him, to make his submission to him personally, to justify himself against what could be alledged against him, and to beseech him to cause his son to be restored to him. 'Tis natural to imagine, that had M. Masner been conscious he was really culpable, he would never have been so imprudent, as to put himself into the hands of the very person who would make himself his own judge; for what passed with respect to M. Renaud might well give him apprehension. Yet he was not suffered on that occasion to speak in vindication of himself, being dismissed, with a promise, however, that he should have this son.

“ But, alas ! We know by the sad experience of half a century, an experience almost fatal to all Europe, what 'tis to rely on French promises. In short, M. Masner, finding all hopes of that kind vain, grew enraged at the insolence and perfidiousness of those who had no regard to what they had so solemnly promised him ; and the anguish of his soul being continually heightened by the remembrance of his only son, he was incited by despair to the seizure which the Count du Luc complains of.

“ I should think, Magnificent Lords, that what I have here represented, ought, at least to extenuate an action, which proceeded only from the excess of a father's tenderness for his child ; and I have the more reason to write to you in favour of M. Masner, since her Majesty the queen, my Sovereign, is persuaded that the ill usage of him, with respect to his son, was brought upon him for his affection to the allies, and the considerable services he has done them. I desire you, therefore, to weigh maturely what I have had the honour to lay before you, and to depend upon it, that her Majesty will never suffer wrong to be done to those who are engaged in her service or in that of her allies. I have the honour to be, with the most perfect esteem for you,

“ Magnificent Lords,

“ Your most humble and most affectionate servant,

“ Coire, Nov. 21, 1710.

On

On the succeeding day the Baron de Greuth, the imperial resident, presented the ensuing memorial:

“ His Imperial Majesty, being informed that the son of his first commissary, M. Thomas Masner, Captain, and Counsellor of Coire, is by order of his most Christian Majesty, imprisoned on the territories of France, near Geneva, has ordered me to apply to your Excellency, that through your good offices the said prisoner may be treated with all the decent usage due to the son of an officer of such a rank, and who suffers only for his father's sake. I hope your Excellency will grant my request, that his Imperial Majesty may not be obliged to use reprisals. I am with very great respect, “ Your Excellency's, &c.

“ Coire, Nov. 22, 1710. BARON DE GREUTH.”

COUNT DELUC'S ANSWER FROM SOLUTHURN NOV. 28.

“ I received the letter which you did me the honour to write to me, by the Emperor's order, the 22d inst. You judge rightly, that I do not want respect for so great a prince, and that I shall always esteem it an honour to evince the same, in all cases, where the king my master's service is not concerned: I shall also reckon it a happiness, if I can demonstrate to yourself, how much I value your merit. Wherefore I take the opportunity you give me to acquaint you, that they impose upon his Imperial Majesty and upon you likewise, who pretend that the son of Thomas Masner is detained in France upon account of the service the father

father has done for the Emperor. 'Tis nothing less than that ; and no great prince, nor any man of honour can espouse the cause of a notorious robber, who might have had his son again, if he could have prevailed with himself to restore the sums he was proved to have in his hands ; but instead of that, he imagined his pretended claim of his son's liberty gave him a right to commit an action unheard of till our times. You are not ignorant of this, sir ; and I assure myself you are troubled for it, since those who seized his highness the Grand Prior at the Gates of Coire, and removed him into the territories of the empire, seemed to intend to make his Imperial Majesty an accomplice. You will be the more convinced of this, by reading the letters Masner has taken the pains to disperse throughout Switzerland, and which men of the better sort look upon as fictitious, because they cannot believe that either the Emperor or his ministers abett him in an action never thought on till now. Your concern for the glory of your master persuades me you will use your endeavours to convince posterity, that war cannot serve for a pretence to authorize an attempt, which may so much affect Princes in what rank soever God has placed them."

The Cantons of Switzerland which professed the Roman Catholic faith resented the measures pursued by M. Masner ; and, in a letter written by their order at an assembly at Lucern, directed to

to the magistrates of Zurich, they insisted that he should be cited to appear before the Helvetic body to answer for his having, more than once, violated the liberty of the frontiers ; from all which facts it will appear, that few events have produced more extensive interference and dissension. The Grand Prior had been at first confined in the castle of Embs, whence he was removed to Munich, as a place of greater security ; and it was at this period that Mr. Manning again addressed the three Leagues in consequence of De Luc's last note. Mr. M. observes, that as he well knew the friendship the Queen of England entertained for the Magnificent Lords, he should ill perform his duty did he not assure them his Royal Mistress felt her attachment increase in proportion to their danger from the menaces of France ; and he hinted, that in such a predicament the advice of a friend might be particularly useful.

After noticing the defamation they endured, he insists they ought to resent it, as being applied through M. Masner, one of their members, a gentleman who had received preferment both from the Emperor and themselves ; and he treats the demand of the release of the Grand Prior in Switzerland as a mere jest, they well knowing, that as he was in the custody of the Emperor it was impossible they could comply. The following passage is so congenial to the feelings of Britons that they should appear in Mr. Manning's own words : " You know very well how his son was basely betrayed, and that he is still detained prisoner in France. It is also evident, that this young gentleman has done nothing that might deserve such treatment ; and this the ambassador himself owned in the presence of your deputies. I am sensible that several matters are laid to his father's charge ; but supposing that the pretensions against him were real and well-grounded (which yet is not granted), there is no law in the world that in a case of this nature makes the son responsible for the father ; so that by necessary consequence it follows, that his son is punished and imprisoned in France unjustly : and there can be nothing more consonant to nature than for a father to endeavour, by all possible methods, to rescue his only and innocent son who suffers wrongfully."

" Hence," he continues, " in the first transports of grief he seized Merveilleux, the pretended interpreter, and detained him, with the consent of the magistrates. Who then can blame M. Masner for seizing a person whom he knew, by undeniable proofs, had, together with his brother (an officer in the service of France) contrived the unjust seizure of his son." Having stated that Merveilleux was by no means an accredited character from the French court, he infers, that thus far every thing stood as a question of right, and he declares his conviction that the Leagues could not punish Masner without denying their subjects all future hope of that protection due to the governed from the governor. As to the style of M. de Luc, precisely similar to that used by his court in the days of power, Mr. Manning invites a comparison between that period and the then moment, telling them to despise the threats of an exhausted nation, and to rely upon the protection of the allies ; and he concludes with a recapitulation of the events of the connexion sometime subsisting between the Leagues and France. “ I do not,” he proceeds, “ apprehend that you are still comprehended in the general League with the Cantons of Switzerland, as formerly, since you concluded that of 1639 with Spain, for the recovery of the Valteline. Neither is it in respect to trade or vicinity ; but only a simple service to some particular persons, which is notoriously known to be reduced to so small a matter, and that so precarious, that several have abandoned it ; and which, at the next reform of the public expence, which the present misery of the French nation must oblige them to make very considerable, will almost entirely cease. It is true, you had whole regiments in the service of France for a considerable time ; but they shewed so little regard to your nation, that the establishment ceased after the decease of General Stupe and Messrs. de Salis, one a Major-General and the other other a Brigadier ; the latter of which, being a Protestant, and dying at Paris, was deprived for several years of a burial : a strange inhuman piece of cruelty ; unknown to infidels and barbarians. At last his friends were obliged to convey his corpse away secretly in a scavenger's cart, and carry it to be interred in the late Major-General Salis's orchard. A noble requital for his services !"

Immediately after Mr. Manning had presented this note the Baron de Greuth informed the Leagues that his Imperial Master felt great surprise at the manner in which they had viewed the seizure of the Grand Prior ; and no less that they should pay more attention to the representations of the French resident than to those of the Imperial Court, whose commissary had been so inhumanly treated through the medium of his son. The Baron therefore desired to know, whether the threats of a person who had never presented his credentials to the Leagues were to be regarded in preference to the request of a neighbour and ally, and whether that partiality did not furnish just reasons for resentment on the part of the Emperor.

The Leagues, having deliberated on the above decisive intimations, transmitted the following letter to the Count de Luc :

" VENERABLE

“ VENERABLE COUNT AND COURTEOUS LORD,

“ What your Excellency wrote to our Republick the 10th of November last, touching the person of Monsieur the Grand Prior de Vendosme, has been communicated to our laudable Commons, and debated in an assembly of the States; and your Excellency may have observed, among other things, by the letter we wrote to you the 17th of last month, how much our Diet disapproved what has been done to Monsieur the Grand Prior by M. Masner, our fellow-countryman and counsellor: but it is notorious that our Republick has not been in the least fault on that account; for the better proof of which the Commons have thought fit to defer, to the next Diet of the States, summoned to meet the 3d of February, 1711, the taking a final resolution upon the demand of releasing Monsieur the Grand Prior, and bringing him back with all his retinue and equipages, to the same place from whence he was carried off. And as he has been conducted to the frontiers of Austria, we shall in the mean time desire his Excellency the Baron de Greuth, his Imperial Majesty's Envoy, to use his good offices with the Court of Vienna; to which end we shall make earnest instances to that Envoy. We have thought fit to order and command Mr. Masner to appear before the said assembly, to inform them by what means Monsieur the Grand Prior may be set

set at liberty. The plurality of the voices of the Commons being requisite to assign what punishment shall be inflicted on the violator and his adherents, and the place of judicature not being agreed upon, patience must be had till the Commons have given their peremptory determination thereupon. Wherefore we have judged it proper to inform your Excellency of the result of this assembly ; we wish you whatever may contribute to your good, and are of your Excellency,

“ The most affectionate Chiefs and Counsellors of the three Leagues of the Grisons assembled at Coire.

“ Given in our name, and sealed with our privy seal, at Coire, the 26th of December, 1710.”

And in the month of January the injured and resolute Masner wrote to La Chapelle in these spirited terms :

“ I took the liberty to write you four letters, the first of which was dated the 10th of September, wherein I proposed a conference in Switzerland, to be informed what demands are made upon me ; and to discourse at the same time of business, in order to end all this trouble : and as this was not accepted, I gave you to understand, Sir, by my following letters, since the 15th of October (whereof I have taken copies for better informing the world of my own and other people's proceedings) ings) that I readily agree to the arbitration proposed with regard to Bombarda, which might be dispatched in an instant, though his Excellency the Ambassador has thought fit, with extraordinary assurance, to write to an assembly of our States, a thing by no means to be maintained, as that assembly will find, by a troublesome experience; and also that I was satisfied with the said arbitration, with regard to the other pretended demandants; but that it was highly just, nay, indispensably necessary, that my adversaries should be named, that I might know whom I had to deal with. And I added in my two last letters, that though the situation of affairs was altered, and that it was no more mine, but his Imperial Majesty's business, I had not changed my sentiments, but remained firm. Nor did I stop at such a declaration, sufficient to reduce to reason the most unreasonable people; but thought fit to give the publick a full account of that affair by my manifesto, being ready to maintain my point, and to convince all mankind, that his Excellency will not find his account in calling me a robber, as he very bluntly does; and furthermore, that if I am by such ill usage forced to it, without longer observing any other measures, I will make it known to all the world, that, on the contrary, it is Frenchmen of an eminent rank, that have made me disburse my own money for the King's service, and have sharpened and cheated me of it,

by

by not reimbursing me. This I can prove by authentic vouchers ; as well as the notorious robbery committed in 1703 at Hockstet, of the value of a thousand pistoles in goods, contrary to the faith of a safe conduct (which cost six pistoles) for which I could never obtain any reparation, though our Republick writ to Marshal Villars, and concerned themselves very deeply in it. If I had not learnt to respect a man of a high character, and minister of a great king, I would not suffer without retaliation such an unworthy treatment, but would make him answer in another and better manner, little regarding in a matter concerning my own honour, and the person of my son, how barbarously they use him, as they have already done, and would still do, which, you may depend upon it, shall not go unrevenge, as it may in time appear.

“ What his Excellency has been pleased to insinuate to the Imperial Envoy, the Baron de Greuth, by his letter of the 26th of last month, that the poor youth was not made prisoner for the services done by me to his Imperial Majesty, but for the sums which it is pretended that I do unjustly detain, is diametrically opposite to what his Excellency writ to Merveilleux the 11th of May, and declared in presence of the deputies of Coire: And farthermore he writes of the 18th of September, to the Leagues of the Grisons, that he would have employed his good offices to procure the enlargement of my son, if it had not been refused to sign the writing in question ; but that having informed the King thereof, several persons during that interval (though Mr. Vigier makes no mention of it in his letter of the 24th of August) had made application to his Majesty, complaining of their losses. The Envoy Baron de Greuth, and the other Imperial ministers, are persons of too great prudence and penetration not to understand the true situation of that unhappy affair, though it has been endeavoured to change the system of it, like the cameleon's colour: but it is easy to avoid being imposed upon, since people are forced to make use of misrepresentations, shams, and tricks, in which there are such palpable and such frequent contradictions, that the silliest body may easily observe the weakness of their reasons.

“ The copies of the letters which his Imperial Majesty has been pleased to write in my favour to his most serene Highness the Prince, governor of Tirol, and to the Envoy, which I have sent you without the least alteration, are not supposititious, but very authentic ; nor can any body but the flatterers and hangers-on about the ambassador doubt of it ; and especially that rash fellow Merveilleux, who presumed to write to one of his friends at Coire, that I had not reason to expect his Imperial Majesty's protection, and would find myself deceived. The letter lately written by the aforesaid Envoy to our Leagues is agreeable to that of his Imperial Majesty, and keeps close to the purport of it; and consequently people should be convinced, that the most puissant protection of his Imperial Majesty is formally granted to me, and with good reason. The aforesaid letter from that Envoy, and that from Mr. Manning, are a sufficient answer to several points which I do not touch, and which are only made use of to colour such unusual proceedings against an innocent boy. Supposing that I had done all the things which are charged upon me (which however is quite otherwise), is there any precedent, on that account, to violate, in the person of my son, the law of nations, and all divine and human laws; to retort it upon him, and by that means exercise a Turkish revenge on me? A noble exploit, I must say!

“A Switzer, who had a hand in the business, has caused some overtures of accommodation to be made to me, bragging that every thing was in his power: but it is not of me that contributions are to be expected; nor am I to be scared by such bravadoes as he. In fine, his Excellency will find at last, that he has let himself be tricked by a pack of knaves, and I am very sorry for it.

“Though you sent me no answer, Sir, to the three afore-mentioned letters which I took the liberty to write to you, since the 15th of October, I have given you the farther trouble of this, hoping that that you will be the less displeased at it, because I will once more make you a reasonable offer, which is to choose at once arbitrators (but upon condition, however, that my adversaries shall be first named, with whom the matter is to come to an issue) provided that my son shall be put into the keeping of the Magistrates of Geneva, to be again given up to the French, in case I be condemned, and do not make satisfaction ; but if, on the contrary, I be absolved, that he be delivered into my hands. This is a fair method of ending the dispute. Propose it, if you please, to his Excellency, and believe me, &c.

To this letter from Mr. Masner the Grand Prior of France added the following postscript with his own hand :

“ I desire you to tell the Count de Luc, that the offers made by Mr. Masner appear so reasonable to me that I must needs advise and desire him to accept them.

“ PHILIP DE VENDOME.”

La Chapelle answered Masner, and referred him to a letter previously written by him, wherein he informed Masner, the situation of his affairs made him an improper medium through which to address the French ambassador ; but, as the Grand Prior had pleased to add a postscript to Masner's letter, he felt himself impelled to violate an order he had received not to interfere in the question under discussion ; and in conclusion he adds, the outrage committed on the Prior prevents the ambassador from entering into any composition with him.

Fresh instructions were shortly after received by Mr. Manning, which produced a third memorial on his part, announcing that the Queen of England approved of all he had before advanced, and desired to reiterate her assurances of protection, not only to M. Masner, but to any other member of the Leagues who might suffer as he had done for his attachment to the cause of the allies. He then mentions certain publications circulated by the partizans of France, and continues, "You very well know, that when they dispersed so many false accounts of the affairs of Spain, we had received advice of the glorious victory which Count Staremberg obtained the 10th of December 1710, with such a small army, that it may be said with Tacitus, in this respect, Nomen magis exercitûs quam robur, because the enemy were three times stronger in number: However, like a second Xenophon, he traversed a vast extent of the enemies' lands with a handful of men, and rendered his retreat more glorious than that of the Grecian captain, because he crowned it with a signal victory." Mr. M. next adverts to the altered tone of the court of France, and calls the attention of the Leagues to the violation of their independence; ending with a critical examination of De Luc's last memorial. The effect produced by the above note was far from from favourable, and Mr. Manning found himself under the necessity of forwarding the succeeding to the Magnificent Lords.

“ It is certainly with much regret that I am obliged to remonstrate to you, by way of complaint, what happened on occasion of my making a visit to the President and Directors in their own houses, where one of them had the boldness to say, that if any person was sent to them, to protect their country against the House of Austria, he was welcome, and not otherwise. I leave it to yourselves to judge, whether by such an expression he does not assume a sovereignty in a free state, where particular persons must not pretend to dictate and prescribe laws. I am the more surprized at it, because you very well know, that according to my power, I always recommended the welfare and concerns of your laudable Leagues, and did my utmost to promote the late negotiations of M. de Salis, your Envoy in Holland. I have all along been of opinion, and am still so, that her Majesty has sent a minister to your republick and its allies to your honour. What punishment then ought to be inflicted on such who presume to act so audaciously, contrary to the uncommon favour shewn to your State, and to prescribe the conditions on which the persons that are sent to you shall be acceptable, or not? Must not he be directly out of his wits then, to think that her Majesty should act contrary to the interest interest of the illustrious house of Austria, so strictly allied with her Majesty, whose justice and integrity is conspicuous to all the world? If this proceeding affected my own person only, I should have passed it over with silence; but the indignity is too great, and my character too much interested, not to demand a sufficient reparation upon this account. If particular persons have so little modesty, as to talk at such a rate, is it not high time for you to recognize your own sovereignty, and to acknowledge, in a grateful manner, the honour which her Majesty does you, by sending a minister to your State? To this end, I demand of you, first, a declaration concerning what M. de Salis has advanced with so much arrogance, whether he was ordered by your laudable Republic to do so; and if not, that then a speedy and sufficient reparation be made for the same? I have the honour of being, Magnificent Lords,

“Your humble and affectionate servant,

“MANNING.”

In this stage of the affair M. Masner published two letters which had been addressed to him by La Chapelle in July and August 1710; from those it appears that every attempt made to detach him from the cause of the allies proved unsuccessful. On the third of March the Chiefs and Deputies came to several resolutions, the purport of which were, that the Bailiff Masner ought immediately mediately to give up his prisoner, with his retinue and equipage, either on the spot where they were seized, or in some part of Switzerland, under the penalty of the displeasure of his Sovereign; and, to facilitate their wishes, they applied to the Envoy Greuth, for the discharge of the Grand Prior. As to the censure to be passed on Masner, they proposed to establish a special tribunal at Ilanz for his trial. They then declare to the French court their ardent wishes for the release of young Masner, and entreat M. de Luc to use his utmost influence with his government for that purpose.

Masner entered his protest against these resolutions, because the Leagues had commanded him to comply with their orders without stipulating for the restoration of his son; and he also declared his conviction that the tribunal which was to judge him ought to review the conduct of those who appointed it for thus violating his rights as a native of their country. These, however, are not the only reasons this unhappy man had for complaint, as the Leagues decreed the confiscation of his estate, and two of the Roman Catholic Cantons banished him from their territories, where if he appeared, two hundred crowns were offered for his apprehension.

Another memorial from Mr. Manning, presented about the same time, contains nothing more than a repetition of what he had before advanced.

advanced. The Baron de Greuth had just then lost his royal Master by the small-pox, which event, together with some well-applied bribes distributed by De Luc to the Leagues, it was supposed might operate much to the disadvantage of Masner; but the court of Vienna soon dispelled his fears by an assurance that all the measures of the deceased Emperor were fully approved of, and would be continued. Mr. Manning, having by this time received further instructions from England, conveyed the Queen's displeasure as to the conduct of Messrs. de Salis towards her minister, with what effect will be discovered by the succeeding note:

“MAGNIFICENT LORDS,

“Understanding that one Merveilleux, a man without any title or character acknowledged by your State, has been so impudent as to write insolently and falsely to you concerning me, presuming to calumniate a person who has the honour to be appointed Resident of a great Queen in your country, the duties of my office oblige me to make my application to you, to inform you how much I am surprized to hear, that you have allowed such an infamous piece to be read in your assembly, instead of dismissing it upon its first appearance. The thing is perhaps of greater nicety and importance than you at first imagined, for to permit in your congress, which represents the whole State, the reading of a letter from a private person, which insolently and unjustly reflects upon a public Minister residing in your country, amounts undoubtedly to the suffering an affront to the prince by whom he is employed. I shall therefore leave it to you to judge the consequences that such a proceeding will have, when her Majesty shall be informed of it: and in the mean time, you may be assured, that I will not so far expose my character, as to make any answer to such an impudent letter: and I shall at least expect, that the interests of your republick will prevail with you, to use in the same manner, a man lost to all sense of honour and reputation; a man who otherwise dares not appear in your country, because of the base and treacherous action which he has committed, in contriving himself the infamous plot of carrying off young Masner, and procuring it to be put in execution by his own brother.

“ I cannot help telling you, that I am furthermore very much surprized, to observe the indifference with which you have received some of my letters, and the attention which you have at the same time given to those which have been sent you from the enemies of the Queen, even from those who never presented any credentials to your State. I shall not at this time enlarge upon that subject, but shall freely tell you, that that is not the way to merit the protection which her Majesty has so generously granted you, and the favours which she does yet give you ground to hope for. Remember, that that great Queen has not sent me to reside with you for the advancement of her interests, but your own. Consider the prosperous efforts which she has so gloriously made for the preservation of the liberties of Europe. And after that, consider the ill countenance (not to speak of the ingratitude) which you will shew, in suffering yourselves to be persuaded by her enemies, who are at the same time the enemies of liberty and all mankind, and to have no regard either to her interposition in favour of your compatriot Mr. Masner, or to my just complaint with regard to the satisfaction I have so often demanded (and last of all by her Majesty's order) for the affront offered me by Messieurs de Salis ; and without which, I foresee that it will be impossible for me to remain in your country to do you service.

“ It is perhaps the last time that I shall have the honour to write to you ; and that I may have nothing to reproach myself withal, with regard to my behaviour with you, I beseech you to give a serious attention to this letter, and to consider, that those States have always been the most respected, and the most durable, where concord, generosity, gratitude, and justice, have had the greatest sway. I have the honour to remain, &c.

Such

Such was the danger of Masner that he thought it prudent to retire to Vienna, where he was most favourably received by the Empress Regent. That court hoping to bring this strange affair to a conclusion, granted the Grand Prior leave to visit France on parole for three months, on condition that he endeavoured to obtain the release of the young captive; this concession had no effect on the Leagues, as we find by the further complaints of Mr. Manning, who received many aggravated insults, and at length an attempt was made to assassinate him. Mrs. Manning had gone to the baths of Pfeffers to improve her health, and her husband was on his return from thence when the event happened, thus related by Mr. Manning himself, in a letter to the diet of the Helvetic body :

“ MAGNIFICENT AND PUISSANT LORDS,

“ Allow me, weak as I am, to do myself the honour to inform you exactly of the misfortune befallen me here: for, since the thing happened in the territories of Swisserland, I thought I could nowhere better apply myself than to the General Diet of the laudable Helvetic Body, for obtaining a satisfaction suitable to the enormity of the crime. The thing, in few words, is as follows :

“ Being

“ Being this day se’nnight on my return hence to Coire, after I had used the waters here, I was surprized on the top of a pretty high mountain (which I was obliged to climb up), by a couple of banditti, who had hid themselves amongst the bushes. They flew upon me at once, with a hideous noise, without giving me time to put myself in a posture of defence; and having thrown me down on the ground, and drawn their sabres (or broad swords), after they had beat off my hat and wig, they gave me many blows upon my bare head, my neck, shoulders, arms, and hands. In a moment I was all in blood; but God gave me strength to get up upon my legs, and deliver myself out of their hands, by throwing myself down a precipice, where I received no hurt, neither by the fall nor the great stones which those wretches flung down after me. My servants, who followed me, were unhappily incumbered with my baggage, and were climbing up the hill at a good distance from me, while I was assaulted by those assassins. I was brought back half-dead to the bath-house, where being dressed, the surgeon found ten wounds in my body, five on the head, and the rest on the arms and hands, besides several contusions. Two of those on my head go as far as the cranium, which is not however (thank God) offended. They give me hopes that I shall recover, with God’s assistance, whose goodness and providence I shall all my my life acknowledge, with continual thankgivings, for such a miraculous deliverance.

“ I must inform you, Magnificent and Puissant Lords, that there are but two roads to this bath, and that I have since been informed, that a gang of those villains watched me in each. I know the faces of the two who assaulted me, whom I had seen three days before in the retinue of the Sieur Merveilleux (the Count De Luc's agent), who came hither from Ragatz, a village about two leagues hence, and his usual place of residence, accompanied by one Captain Davatz, of the county of the Grisons, under pretence of visiting a French officer, but indeed to make me known to those assassins, lest they should miss me. So black an attempt upon a public person in a neutral country, in violation of all the laws of God and man, does, I think, require that the necessary perquisitions should be made. I have heard that the Sieur Merveilleux was not ashamed as he passed through Zurich, the day after I was assassinated, to own that the thing was done by his order. I doubt not but you will cause justice to be done upon the infamous authors of such a base and perfidious piece of treachery, equally barbarous and unprecedented.

“ This is, Magnificent and Puissant Lords, all that I have judged necessary to represent unto you, till I shall receive the orders of the Queen my Mistress upon the matter in question. And mean time, I pray Almighty God, to shower down his most precious blessings upon your laudable and puissant Republic, and your illustrious Persons, being, with the most perfect consideration, &c.

“ F. MANNING.”

Mr. Stanian, our resident in another part of Switzerland, warmly insisted on satisfaction for this dreadful outrage, which was reiterated by the Imperial ambassador, to no purpose; this, together with the insolent attacks made by De Luc against Mr. Manning's character, and the most malignant processes against Masner, caused a peremptory order on the part of the Austrians to prevent, by every possible means, the passage of grain into the country of the Grisons. Far, however, from being intimidated, the diet of the Swiss Cantons informed the French and Imperial residents that they would take effectual measures to preserve their neutrality, by preventing, for the future, the troops of either nation from passing through their territories: they also wrote to the Prince Palatine and Prince Eugene, requesting them to coincide with them in this determination: they made a resolution, at the same sitting, expressive of resentment at the attempt against Mr. Manning, which, it was generally believed, was merely superficial. De Luc did not remain an idle spectator of these transactions, but endeavoured to ruin the character of Masner, by publishing publishing the depositions of Charles Grison and John and Ulrick Zellwegher, who accused that gentleman (to whom they had been servants) of embezzlements and cheating, as commissary, poisonings and intended assassinations. As these depositions were taken in presence of Merveilleux, they were generally disbelieved, though one of them offered a letter in proof from Masner to him, advising the destruction of papers which might criminate them. The friends of Masner were much alarmed for his safety ; but, courageous and undismayed, he despised the villainy of his waggoner, factor, and book-keeper, and went to Feldkirken, near Coire, a place belonging to the House of Austria, where he issued a vindication of his conduct against the following charges exhibited to the tribunal at Ilanz, and to which they solemnly cited him to appear and answer :

“ II. For having neglected the duties of the office he was honoured with in 1706, and relinquished his commission to seize one Somery, a French courier, thereby violating the neutrality, &c.

“ III. For having bales, boxes, &c. belonging to foreign merchants, and taking thence goods, letters, &c. put into the same, counterfeited money, &c.

“ IV.

“ V. For seizing, in a scandalous manner, and by his own authority, the Sieur Merveilleux in 1702.

“ VI. For detaining in prison likewise, by his own authority, one Carlo Grison in 1706.

“ VII. For involving the state in great difficulties, by having recourse to the protection of foreign powers, to the prejudice of his own sovereigns.

“ VIII. For attempting to seize several persons to hinder their giving evidence of his crimes.

“ IX. For insulting, in January 1711, the diet of the state with a numerous company of followers, amongst whom there were several suspicious persons.

“ X. For publishing scandalous libels against his superiors.

“ XII. For endeavouring to create disorders in the state, by false suggestions or imputations spread amongst the Commons.

“ XIII. For coining false money, and by means of it committing several frauds.

“ XIV. For stealing chests of foreign money, and putting counterfeit coin amongst it.

“ XVI.

“XVI. For breaking open several chests, and taking thence silver ingots, and gold and silver thread, and filling them up again with earth, stones, &c. and,

“Lastly, For threatening to have his business decided by violence, and invading in several points the supreme authority of right belonging to the sovereign only.”

Aware of the consequences, he treated the summons with contempt; upon which his base and unworthy judges decreed as follows:

“Having heard and read the accusations, and several letters written by the accused, with all that has been alleged against him by the Fiscal, after having first implored the Divine direction and assistance, we have pronounced the following sentence against him; viz. That the accused, M. Masner, who is fled from justice, is deprived of his honour and employments, banished the three Leagues of the Grisons, and all their dependencies, for ever; that three hundred ducats shall be given as a reward to any one (though a banditti) that shall kill him; and one thousand ducats to any person that shall deliver him alive into the hands of justice. We further sentence the accused as a malefactor, a breaker of the laws of God and this state, a rebel, a robber, false coiner; and, as guilty of other notorious crimes he is accused of, to have his body quartered by the common hangman: but since he absconds, the execution is to be performed in effigy, and his rebellious papers against the state, or its representatives, to be burnt here by the hangman, his house to be pulled down to the ground, and his possessions here, or in foreign parts, to be forfeited to the Fiscal. And such persons as have at any time insisted on his having his liberty, or corresponded with him by letters or by word of mouth, or shall hereafter harbour or conceal him, shall incur the displeasure of this State, and pay one thousand crowns. For this reason all the magistrates and every subject of this State are obliged by oath to execute this sentence against him the said Thomas Masner, without any form or process, whenever they shall apprehend him: but, because several natives, who have effects abroad, suffer already by having the same burthened with impositions, and confiscated at the instigation of the said Masner, we think it necessary to do them justice, and empower them to sue his children and offspring for a compensation of their losses and charges. This is our sentence pronounced for the sake of justice, and in the name of the Supreme Judges. Done at Ilantz, August 17, 1711."

The French party having succeeded thus far, publicly threatened Swartz, a Burgomaster at Coire, and other friends of Masner's, and actually caused

caused reprisals to be made for the already mentioned prohibitions of the Austrians. This insolence did not meet with the reception hoped for by the three Leagues, which it was supposed received a check through the ensuing memorial from the British envoy :

“ MAGNIFICENT LORDS,

“ I received the letter which you had the goodness to write to me the 19th instant, besides a copy of the informations, taken by the bailiff at Sargants, about the projected murder of Mr. Manning: having perused them, my sentiments are the same with yours, that the said bailiff be ordered once more, to make a stricter enquiry into it, that the assassins themselves may be discovered. I must observe to you, though with extreme regret, the little inclination hitherto shewn by the bailiff to search into the bottom of this villainy, in order to find out the contrivers of it: his indifference and remissness in his duty appear plainly, 1. Because he did not make the least enquiry in seven weeks after this execrable fact was committed, notwithstanding he was obliged, by virtue of his office, to have done it upon the first notice given him, without expecting an order from his superiors, that the murderers might have had no opportunity to make their escape. 2. He neglected to oblige the two persons suspected to be privy to this affair to corroborate their evidences by oath, whereas they ought to have been tortured, as has been practised on occasions of less importance than this. 3. The said bailiff, in all the interrogations he has put these two months past, did not ask the above-mentioned persons the names and characters of the assassins, who, in his partial informations, are concealed, under the name of servants or soldiers belonging to M. Merveilleux; though the principal end of this examination was, to discover the authors and actors of that horrible crime. Instead of proceeding in this affair as is usual on such occasions, the bailiff delayed making enquiry into it, till there was no hope left of apprehending the criminals: It is true, that at last he took some examinations; but omitting the most natural and material points, he endeavours, as much as in him lies, to extenuate the barbarity of the fact, and to give you a false notion of Mr. Manning's conduct. If I thought it worth while, I could make a great many other remarks about the pretended informations; but since you, who are as much dissatisfied with them as I myself, have commanded him to make a stricter search, I will wait the issue of your new orders about it.

“How imperfect soever the information taken by your bailiff is, it is, however, evident, that this villainous attempt was made by the servants of M. Merveilleux; and that the next day all three made their escape. What remains farther necessary necessary to convince you that M. Merveilleux was the chief contriver of this infamous fact? I dare assure myself, that you have not the least doubt of it; and in this confidence, I demand of you, once more, justice against him. Summon him then to appear before you, in order to answer, if he can, the charge laid against him; even by the information of your bailiff. I have already acquainted you, that the ambassador of France cannot grant protection to the murderers, and that he has no right to do it. If M. Merveilleux can clear himself of the crime he is suspected of, it will be well; but if he finds himself guilty, and continues to abscond, to avoid the effects of your justice, I hope you will proceed against him, as is usual in such cases. This it is which the Queen demands of your justice, and of your zeal, which you are obliged to express, in repairing her honour, violated in the person of her minister. I pray God to heap on you his choicest blessings, and remain with great truth,

“Magnificent Lords,

“Your most humble servant,

“STANIAN.”

They now thought proper to send deputies to Mr. Manning, and messages to the other foreign ministers, declaring their wish to preserve the friendship of their different courts; and even De St. Luc informed the Leagues he desired the punishment nishment of Masner, and not the ruin of his family : that gentleman soon after appealed to the university of Tubingen, in Suabia, against the process at Ilantz, and sent his wife to the Emperor at Milan, to solicit his farther interference, which she readily obtained. Although St. Luc affected some degree of moderation, not a word escaped him respecting the release of young Masner ; this exasperated the inhabitants of Coire, and they began to shew strong symptoms of displeasure towards the persecutors of this unhappy family, which was increased in a very considerable degree by the despicable conduct of Vendosme, who broke his parole, and, instead of returning to Germany, went to Paris, for the ostensible purpose of procuring the enlargement of their countrymen, and the representations of the elder Masner, who produced several letters from the agents of France, containing large offers to divert him from the cause of the Allies.

The peace which took place immediately after terminated this affair to the satisfaction of all parties.

LYONS AND GENEVA INUNDATED, 1711.

This was one of those events which occur but seldom in the lapse of several centuries; and it is fortunate for mankind that it has pleased the great Creator of all things to set limits to the operations of nature, which are generally so precise and regular that we may approach the very borders of destruction almost with a certainty of safety. The vast accumulations of snow and ice produced by the winter were converted into water early in February, and descending to the Aire from every direction, swelled the Rhone till the stream actually flowed the contrary way, and forced the wheels of the different mills and machines situated on its banks, to work in the same retrograde manner. At the place where the Rhone and Saone form a junction, the expanse of water was supposed to be half a league in breadth, and the stream pursued its course quite across the lake of Geneva without mixing with its water. The Mercur Galant, whence this article is derived, observes, that an event like this might have suggested the fable of the river Acis, which, enamoured of the nymph Galatea, followed her to Sicily, preserving its stream pure and fresh amidst the surrounding sea. On the eve of St. Matthias the Rhone and Saone at Lyons were found to have been suddenly increased to a degree beyond the memory of any person then living, which caused the more astonishment, as the overflowings of those rivers were usually gradual. The channel of the Rhone bounds the city on the side of Dauphiné, and the Saone passes through the town; on this occasion they joined their streams in the places of Belcour and Confort, and spread over the whole of the space between those and the Rue Merciere, compelling the inhabitants to have recourse to boats for their safety. The several churches of the Jacobins, Celestines, and of Charity, were greatly injured; the old arsenal was almost covered by the water, the timber-bridge at Belcour nearly disappeared, and many houses in the suburb La Guillotiere were entirely overthrown. A pyramid erected in la place Confort recorded the junction of the Rhone and the Saone in that spot in the year 1554, but the inundation of that period was lower by eighteen inches than that of 1711, and after an interval of one hundred and fifty-seven years.

Another, but still more remarkable and dreadful event occurred at Lyons in October the same year. It had been a long-established custom for the inhabitants to visit St. Denys de Bron, a short distance from the suburbs, on the eleventh, for the double purposes of piety and drinking wine of the new vintage. The city gates were not closed on those occasions till seven o'clock, but on the fatal evening of the celebration this year, the the guard beat the retreat at a quarter after six ; crowds returned at the summons, to whom the soldiers at the barrier of the bridge Guillotiere refused admittance without payment of a sum they demanded. At the moment the bridge would contain no more persons the wretches within opened the gate for a coach passing outward ; the pressure consequently became excessive, many were beaten down by the horses and each other ; numbers leaped upon the coach, which broke down with their weight ; and even the animals that drew the vehicle were suffocated after they had fallen, with their exertions to escape, amongst the dead and dying heaped upon them. The confusion did not completely subside before three o'clock in the morning, when 216 bodies were ranged on the ramparts to be owned, exclusive of those carried away by their friends, or had leaped or been pushed into the Rhone.

OBSEQUIES FOR THE DAUPHIN OF FRANCE, 1711.

This prince died of a most malignant small-pox, which rendered it imprudent for any part of the royal family to assist at the funeral. The British Mercury gave an interesting account of the ceremony at his obsequies, and in a succeeding number an historical sketch of those preceding the then period, which the Editor begs leave to offer for the perusal of his readers, arranged as the writer

writer would have placed them himself had the nature of periodical publications permitted.

“The antient French chivalry introduced a great many extraordinary ceremonies in funeral solemnities. When their kings did not specially appoint managers of the ceremony, the care of them devolved of course, for the greatest part, on the heralds, who were then a sort of vice-knights, well instructed in all the laws of chivalry, who by their noble achievements merited the public esteem, and whose valour acquired them an authority, which they preserved even in old age.

“But since the time of Charles VI. the quality of herald is, in the French nation, very much vilified and degraded as to that point. And the French kings have at every ceremony appointed some eminent person to regulate it, according to the antient custom.

“Henry III. in his passage through Italy, took a relish for the manners of the Italians, who are very ceremonious. He created several employments ; and amongst the rest, in the year 1585, he appointed a master of the ceremonies, and a deputy master to perform his functions in his absence. The title of great master was given to the first a long time afterwards.

“It would seem by these employments, that all the ceremonies should be regulated, and no innovation to be made ; yet they are seldom the same ; and there happen frequent incidents, by the mutual endeavours of the officers to encroach upon each other's privileges : insomuch, that the kings have several times been puzzled how to decide such points of honour with justice ; it being difficult to determine precisely to whom they do of right belong.

“ At the funeral of Philip August, the cardinal legate and the archbishop of Rheims did each pretend it to be his right to officiate pontifically. The dispute was violent ; and for terminating the difference, two altars were erected ; at which they celebrated both at one time, and with an equal voice, so that one chorus might answer both. At the obsequies of Lewis IX. called St. Lewis, king Philip III. his son, carried his father's corpse, or rather his bones, upon his shoulders, from the cathedral church called the Church of our Lady, at Paris, to St. Denis. The crosses which still remain in the highway were erected at the places where he rested. And there is a tradition, that many miracles have been wrought at those places, where they say that great numbers of sick persons have been cured. The multitude which followed the convoy was very numerous. The most eminent of the great men were there, and all the prelates who were at court, in their pontifical robes. But the monks of St. Denis, pretending that the archbishops and bishops incroached upon their authority, by attempting to come into their church with their pontifical ornaments, shut the doors, and and would not suffer any body to come in till it was agreed that the prelates should divest themselves of their ornaments, that they might go into the church without any pomp or mark of authority or jurisdiction over them.

“ It was ordinary for kings on such occasions, when they were present at funeral solemnities, to follow the corpse on horseback along the roads ; and when they came to any town or village, they alighted : but that custom is entirely ceased since the time of Charles V.

“ The obsequies of the princes of France have been sometimes performed with little pomp or ceremony. At the funeral of Isabel of Bavaria, relict of Charles VI. there was no pomp or ceremony at all, according to the historians of that time, though the registers of the parliament make mention of some ceremonies ; but that may perhaps be meant of the solemn services performed by the monks of St. Denis, who resolved to pay all possible honour to the memory of that princess, who had heaped innumerable favours upon them ; for the historians on the contrary say, that her corpse was put, without any pomp, into a boat, with only one priest with two tapers, and three officers of her majesty’s household, by whom it was conducted from the castle de Tournelles, where she died, to the abbey-church of St. Denis. They add, that the neglect of the funeral solemnities was attributed to the confusion of the times,

all that part of the country being then in the possession of the English.

“ At the funeral of Charles VIII. his corpse was borne by twenty gentlemen of his household.

“ At that of Lewis XII. the hanouars, or salt-bearers, pretended that that honour was due to them, as having been granted them amongst other privileges, by several kings. The gentlemen yielded it to them, and they have maintained themselves in possession of it ever since.”

“ We have received from Paris a particular account of the solemn service performed in the Royal Abbey-Church of St. Denis, for the repose of the soul of the late Dauphin, on the 18th of June last, with so much pomp and magnificence, that we presume the Reader will not unwillingly accept of that account:

“ All the gates of the Town were hung with black, without any escutcheons; but that on the entry to the court before the church was adorned with cartouches and small escutcheons with some big ones amongst them, with the Dauphin's arms upon them. The three great doors of the church were all hung, and so was the breadth of the porch, as far as the little turrets. The nave of the church was hung within 10 or 12 feet of the arch, and adorned with several ranks of cartouches and escutcheons.

the pillars. Under that cloth a gallery was made, adjoining to the door, which advanced about 20 foot into the nave, in which the musick was placed. On each side of the choir, and between that and the altar, were hung above the high chairs six large pieces of black cloth, bordered with ermine, and adorned above and below with three several ranks, beautified with drops of silver dolphins, and flower-de-luces of gold. Between these great squares were bands in the form of pilasters, which were in the same manner adorned with drops of silver dolphins, and flower-de-luces of gold. In the middle of these pilasters were great escutcheons with the Dauphin's arms, and his cyphers alternately, as were also upon the cornices, which were surmounted by a great sconce or luminary, which reigned over the choir; and over against the escutcheons, which were under the cornices, they had fixed branched candlesticks, with great wax candles.

“The representation was elevated eight steps, upon a square two feet and a half high, under a canopy supported by four pillars, above which there was a crown, closing at the top with ten dolphins, with their scales sticking out, in which wax candles were put, and thereby a luminary formed, which made a very pretty show at such a distance; and in the middle of which there was one candle of an extraordinary size, and a great deal higher than all the rest. The steps up to the

“ Upon the great altar, there was only six, and six more above the counter-table, on either side of which there were curtains of black velvet, as high as it, and adorned with silver fringes, and with escutcheons; and there were also sattin curtains made fast to the columns of the altar.

“ Under the counter-table there was a great cross of mohair, with four large escutcheons upon velvet, surmounted by a canopy, with its curtains tied, which entirely hid the counter-table, and the uppermost luminary. Beside this canopy, there were two sorts of pilasters, adorned with silver flowers, dolphins, and flower-de-luces of gold, propt up by two machines, which were covered with candles.

“ A quarter after ten o'clock, they begun to light the great luminary, and the new Dauphin being arrived with the Dukes of Berry and Orleans, those Princes were conducted to the apartments prepared for them, at the end of the first division of the antient cloister. The staircase was all hung with black cloth, and so was the passage as far as the apartment, in which there was a canopy. As soon as they had put on their vestments of ceremony, they went to take their places in the three high chairs in the choir, next that appointed for the Abbot, and which is never filled but when he is there.

“ The

“The five choristers begun the requiem, which was continued with the King’s musick, and then Kyrie eleeson. As the Prelates went into the choir, they saluted or bowed to the Representation, to the Princes, and to the Representation of Lewis XIII. and the Altar. The Archbishop of Rheims was the celebrant, and was assisted by the Bishops of Quebec, Auxerre, Seer, and Autun.

“In the Sanctuary on the right, towards the Gospel, there was an amphitheatre, with benches or seats for the Monks of the place, who had performed their several exercises in the chapel called Chapelle de Chevet, behind the great altar. Towards the Epistle, there were benches for the Clergy, and opposite to them five elbow chairs of velvet, for the Archbishop and his four Assistants.

“The Epistle was sung by Don Taveroles, a Friar, Sub-Deacon, and the Gospel by Don Quenet, a Monk, Deacon; two of the Bishop’s Assistants, being Deacon and Sub-Deacon of Honour. The Gradual was sung by the five Choristers, Monks, and the prose with the musick. The Offertory being ended, the Dauphin went to the Oblation, being preceded by the Master of the Ceremonies, who made his obeisances to the altar, from below the stairs of the sanctuary, as also to the Princes, the superior Courts, and the Clergy; and then he went and kissed the Celebrant’s brant's ring; after he had presented the wax candle, there were ten pieces of gold at the Dauphin's, eight at that of the Duke of Berry, and six at that of the Duke of Orleans.

“The funeral oration was pronounced by the Bishop of Angers. He chose for his text, the 13th and 17th verses of the 3d chapter of the Proverbs, which he joined together, and applied them to the Dauphin; Beatus homo qui invenit Sapientiam & affluit Prudentia; Viæ ejus, Viæ rectæ, & omnes semitæ ejus pacificæ. In English, according to the common version; Happy is the Man that findeth Wisdom, and the man that getteth Understanding: Her ways are ways of Pleasantness, and all her paths are Peace.

“The Dauphin, and the Dukes of Berry and Orleans, went out of the church a little before four o'clock, to put off their vestments, and they came out of their apartments at three quarters after four, by the great door of the church, being followed by the Prior, and several of the Monks, and their Officers; after which, they went all three into one coach, to go to Marli. Several companies of the Guards were drawn up in a lane between the first door of the aisle of the church, and the street which leads from St. Denis, by the road to Paris; and the contests between the Guard of 100 Switzers, and the Life-Guards, about the Barrier, came to such a height, that they were obliged to send an express to Marli, to know to whom it should belong, and it was given in favour of the latter.

“ The 3d of July, there was likewise a solemn service on the same occasion, at the Cathedral of Paris, where the Cardinal de Noailles officiated pontifically, and Father de la Rue, a Jesuit, pronounced the funeral oration. The Dauphin, accompanied by the Dukes of Berry and Orleans, was at the head of the mourners, as at St. Denis, and the Clergy, the Parliament, the Court of Aids, the University, and the Magistrates, &c. of Paris assisted at it, having been thereto invited by the King's command, by Monsieur des Granges, Master of the Ceremonies. The Cardinal of Noailles treated the three Princes at dinner, after the service.”
